For be it understood that this practical Emperor affects the dishes of the country. On Sunday the disner was again composed of the plate du pays, and although the Imperial party did not go as far as to taste the native liquor, they essayed the next most fiery beverages—past and sherry to wit. These, however (and they were the only wines), they drauk taste the native liquor, they emayed the next most flery beverages—part and sherry to wit. These, however (and they were the only wines), they drauk so sparingly that one bottle of each sufficed for a party of ten. The hotchpotch was much relished, and they whole "farrel" on his plate, and seemed to enjoy it amazingly. It will interest your lady readers to learn that neither the Empress nor her ladies dressed for dinner. The court is in deep mourning, and the heavy black dresses were not changed for evening dress, at least not during the Sojourn at Tarbert. I was astonished at the extreme plainness manifested by the ladies in their dress. The Empress wore a thick stuff gown, very simply made up, and she wore no ornaments. The ladies are very dark and sallow, and they are not improved by the ugly crape head-dress they wear in foors. The Countess de Barral's hair is silver white, soft, and beautiful, and she weares it becomingly braided in rolls around her comely face. The Countess was easily recognised by her hair, just as the Emperor was easily distinguished by his lofty figure and tawny beard dappled with iron grey. At dinner the Imperial party were not waited upon by their Brazilian servants, "who, the females, beyond making eyes" and the males, beyond making eyes" and the males, beyond making eyes" and the males, beyond making eyes and the males, beyond making eyes and the males, beyond smoking cigarettes and lounging about, appeared to have almost nothing to do, but by the waiters of the hotel.—North British Daily Mail. were steerage passengers on the Ply-mouth Rock, bound for New York. A vast primeval forest in the neighbourhood covers hundreds of shousands of acres, broken here and there by infrequent openings, and skirted by but scanty population. The story of this youthful hermit, as related, is simple, but extraordinary. He is of respectable parentage, was comfortably off, and has many sliving connections. One day he was ploughing in a field on his father's farm when bad news was brought him. An uncle, to whom he had been deeply attacthed, had anddenly died. Without a word he left the horse standing in the plough, and made directly for the woods. He had then seen barely a score of summers, CANADA FLOUR cha horse standing in the plough, and made directly for the woods. He had then seen barely a score of summers, and he is now forty years of age. During the whole period he has lived alone in the wilderness. At first he was naturally pursued, but he plunged into the deepest recesses of the forest, and probably in some cave that he had discovery. For a time he is supposed to have remained in the wildest spots that are most distant from human dwellings. At all events he kept out of sight with great care until he thought his friends would have becomerceosciled his absence and would cease to follow him. After this, but at long intervals, he was seen nearer home, and on two or three rare occasions he has exchanged a few words with his kinsfolk. The Banner affirms, that he was last seen a few weeks ago; that his has a last seen a few weeks ago; that his face is en'itely covered with a blook heard grossing close up to the eyes and flowing down to his middle; that his height and weight, which were formerly shose of an average man, have increased so that he is much above the iniddle size; and that he moved with the catilite aleutness characteristic of the savage, or of those who have long lived away from, and alunned, their kind.
