With a feeling almost of horror, he dropped the hand he had taken, and apringing from his chair moved aimleasly about to. room. Upon the table lay a volume of new poems. Mechanically he opened the covery within was written in a delicate hand, "Ross Vivine to Roland Crowninshield." In the flush which burned across his brain, and made the letters wim before his eyes, he could not see that the three last words were written in a feigned hand, evidently an imitation of the two first—a playful torgery. Herofity saw what he naturally thought a proof that Rose was already the affianced wife of his brother. Shutting the book with
