he was very hard hit. But, when nothing seemed to come of it, I forgot the rumors. Geoff, my poor fellow, this is awful! How does his own fortune stand?"

"Very much impaired, so much that when I make good the loss on Sibyl's fortune my mother will be very straitened in means. It was to save her from this, and also to save my father's honor, that I intended trying to replace what had been lost during the time that remains of Sibyl's minority. I decided that my best chance to make money quickly was here, so I came—with what result, thus far, you know."

"You have not been here very long," said Halbert. "One failure signifies nothing. How have you been impressed. There is no place in the world, I am sure, where it is possible for the investment of a little capital to produce such large results. But time is needed to accomplish these results."

"That is the case averwhere. Only in little capital to produce such large results. But time is needed to accomplish these results."

"That is the case everywhere. Only in dreams are fortunes realized in a day. Well, my dear fellow, as far as I am concemed, and I know I can answer for Sibyl. the time is yours. Neither she nor I will demand what has been lost, because we are well assured that you will repay it to the last farthing as soon as you are able. Only take care that you do not risk more than you can afford in the pursuit of it."

"I shall take care," said Derwent, "for I cannot afford to lose anything, and nothing is so near my heart as the payment of this debt. Frank, you are a true friend, I can never forget how you have taken this! I have no words with which to thank you, but I feel it more deeply than I can say."

"You have no reason to thank me," replied the other. "Merely as man to man could I do less when I have the utmost confidence in your honor and know that you are anxious to repair what is no fault of yours? Besides this, my uncle's good name is almost as dear to me as it is to you. I can never fail to remember that he put me ou my feet when I was young and struggling. For the rest, it is not Sibyl's fortune that I have sought in seeking her, though of course it will be my duty to see that it is not thrown away. If it were legitimately lost, however, I should not mourn. We can do without it."

"You shall not need to do without it," said Derwent. "Your faith and confidence give me fresh courage. There are many more mines in Maxico besides the Buena Esperanza, and, God helping me, one of them shell yield back all that has been lost of Sibyl's fortune."

"And something for yourself too, I hope," said Halbert, smilling.

Not for a long time had sleep been so sweet to Derwent as it was that night. The consciousness of his cousin's friendship—so quiet, so undemonstrative, but so sincere, when tried by the test most difficult to man—seemed to revive his whole nature

Sate before she came there was a surprise, amounting to a shock, in store for him. It occurred one evening when, Mrs. Derwent and Shyl having retired early, wearied by a day of sight-seeing, Halbeert and himself were smoking together in the sitting-room of the former. The door was open, parely for the balmy air, partly that they might anjoy the fairly-like scene which the hotel and its garden always present at night, the graceful enicroling galleries lighted brilliantly with incandessent electric lights, and the rich tropical foliage of the garden fully revealed in the white radiance.

"I have never been in a place that charmed me so much as this," said Halbeert, attending the been subject to the large of the strong wine. The stath it had been to bear his his father's honor and justify the confidence, what a strain it had been to bear his father's honor and justify the confidence in the large of the strength of the 'Veredem his father's sho continued. What is the peculiar circumstances that make everything seems so enchanting. And by the bye, Geoffrey, I feel that I ought to tell you something about those circumstances. It hardly seems fair to keep you a light of the strength of the 'Veredem his father's sho contiliar and the state of the strength of the 'Veredem his father's sho contiliar and the state of the strength of the 'Veredem his father's sho contiliar should be a state stand in the state of the strength of the 'Veredem his father's sho contiliar should be a state state of the strength of the 'Veredem his father's sho contiliar should be a state state of the strength of the 'Veredem his father's sho contiliar should be a state state of the strength of the 'Veredem his father's sho contiliar should be a state state of the strong state of the strength of the 'Veredem his father's should be a state state of the strength of the 'Veredem his father's should be a state strength of the 'Veredem his state of the strength of the 'Veredem his state of the strength of the 'Veredem his s contrary, I tear the news will not be pleasant to you."

There was more than a moment's silence now. Derwent felt indeed as if he had been most unexpectedly knocked down. This was an event on which he had not reckoned in calculating the possibility of atoning for his father's wrong-doing. In all his considerations he had never considered the probability that Sibyl might marry before she attained her majority, and thus anticipate the time of settlement in fact, there can be little doubt that the general opinion of every one about them had lad him to face. marry before she attained her majority, and thus anticipate the time of settlement in fact, there can be little doubt that the general opinion of every one about them had led him to fancy that he might marry her himself, if he chose to do so. The blow to his vanity (which really had been very little concerned) was not, however, the cause of his silence. He was overwhelmed by the terrible necessity of telling Halbert how matters stood.

But nothing was more natural than that Halbert should have misunderstood his silence. He said at length, in a low tone, "Geoff, I am more sorry for this than I can say. I feared it would be so, but Silvy was sure that I was mistaken. She insisted that you never were in love with her, but I knew you could not have been associated with her so closely and fail to be."

"Sibyl is right," said Derwent, rousing himself with an effort. "I suppose it is because we have been associated so closely —almost like brother and sister—that I never was in love with her, though I know of no giri more altogether worthy of a man's love. As far as that is concerned, (To be Continued.)

But your news has been a shock to me for an altogether different reason. I am in terrible trouble about Sibyl's fortune." indeed, you have them in any case. But your news has been a shock to me for an altogether different reason. I am in terrible trouble about Sibyl's fortune."

"Geoffrey!"

"Yes; that is why I am here. When I looked into my father's affairs efter his death, I found, to my horror, that he used Sibyl's money in an unjustifiable manner. Of course he intended to replace it; it happened, unfortunately, to be in a temptingly convenient form, but death overtook him, as it has overtaken many another man, before he could repair what he had done. You may not have known that he was concerned in several unlucky speculations during the last years of his life."

"I suspected it," said Halbert. "In fact, it was whispered once or twice that Let the World Know You are in It.

Mr. J. R. Allen, upnoisterer, Toronto, sends us the following: "For six or seven years my wife sufered with Dyspepsia, Costiveness, Inward Piles and Kidney Complaint. We tried two physicians and any number of medicines without getting any relief, until we got a bottle of Korthrop & Lyman's, Vegetable Discovery. This was the first relief she got, and before one bottle was used the benefit she derived from it was beyond our expectation."
