Mr. Marter had adjourned the debate after Mr. Harcourt's fine speech when moving the second reading. He, therefore, started the debate yesterday in a speech of an hour and a quarter, re-ceived by the House for the most part the only points in speech which the Opposition applauded with any unanimity being his reference to the duty of the Government to resign if they could not maintain their principles, and his allusion to the determination of the people of the province to hurl the Government from power at the first opportunity. by declaring that nothing was further from his mind than politics in dealing with the question. The treasurer, Graham and Stringle, pitchers; he said, held that the Government must move slowly in this direction, and it was the general opinion of the temperance people that they were moving slowly enough. This cautious policy was justified on the ground that legislation must not outstrip education on the question. Whether the people were educated up to advanced legislation he would leave to Mr. J. J. Maclaren, who had recently stated that public sentiment was far in advance of legislation, that indeed legisdation, that indeed legisdation, that indeed legisdation, that indeed legisdation are discontinuous and the sentiment was far in advance of legislation, that indeed legisdation are discontinuous and the sentiment was far in advanced by the sentiment was far in advanced lation was no further advanced than

The Premier was warmly applauded by his followers when he stood up. He began by an allusion to Mr. Marter's disavowal of any political motives in the speech he had just made, and awakened the plaudits of his side by declaring that it was politics from beginning to end, and instanced his characterizing Mr. Harcourt's speech as applosetic, a speech forcible, impress
