BT S. B. M. the embodiment of beauty. None could have thought otherwise, seeing her as she sat there alone on the piazza, her lovely form slightly inclined, her hands clasped on her lap, and one small and shapely foot lightly tapping the floor; the long, sweeping lashes drooping languidly ever her dreamy, lustrous eyes, and a sweet smile playing about her scarlet mouth, which was open just enough to exhibit the even tips of her pearly teeth. The restless, crimson tide, coursing beneath the pure, transparent skip, would occasionally suffuse her cheeks and then pass gradually away, only to surge back again and mantle face, neck and bosom with a burning blush. Yes, Minerva Lambert was beautiful, and never did she look more so than now, as, flushed with apparent excitement, and totally unconscious of the charming picture she formed, she sat there where the long, trailing vines swayed to and fro on one side, casting fantastic shadows on the foor, and on the other motley flowers nodding lazily in the gentle breeze that lifted sweet fragrance from their coroniform erests, while the slanting beams of the evening sun rested like a halo on her Minerva had two lovers-that is, two, enly one of whom she could think of acepting as her companion through life.

Literally, she had at least a dozen, but only two dared to hope for her hand.
These were Leroy Beaumont and Mark

Spencer.

Leroy was the son of wealthy parents;
Mark was comparatively poor. Leroy was very handsome, with dark, flashing eyes, black, glossy hair and fierce-looking mustache; Mark was not, though his bright and ever-smiling countenance was anything but a disagreeable aspect.

They were not friends, but it was not because of their rivalry. They had never been personally acquainted. Leroy, thinking that features anch as his were essential to any one who would win the hand of tial to any one who would win the hand of that to any one who would win the hand of that beauty, was, consequently, confident of his ability to gain the victory, and, per-haps, was unprejudiced.

Mark appinion was different. Although not nearly so confident of success as his competitor, his was too noble a nature to competitor, his was too notice a land allow hatred or jealousy to be excited within him, and he believed that Minerva Lambert would not judge by personal ap-pearance which was most deserving of the pearance which was most deserving of the much-coveted hand.

But Minerva, it must be said, had a few romantic notions in her head.

Her father, knowing the reputation of Mark Spencer, advised her to accept him in preference, a to the other. in preference to the other, but she hesi Mr. Beaumont was so handsome, tall and graceful, and he had such bright and flashing eyes, and then that captivating moustache was an adornment that Mr. Spencer could not boast of.

Did she love Leroy Beaumont? she thought she did, though when in the society of Mark Spencer she was in doubt. She was not capable of reading her own

She did not give them her answer, but dismissed them both with the information that they must wait till to-morrow, and thus give her time to decide. Then she set her wits to work.

Which should she accept? She was in a mont, but then she knew to be a true character. Spencer she knew to be a true gentleman, but then he lacked that attractiveness of feature which, she thought, would have made him look so much more would have made him look so much more child and manly.

sent one of them to each of her lovers.

They ran thus:

It was just the night for a meeting of lovers. The moon looked down with modified splender from her starry throne. Her image was reflected in the limpid stream. Her tempered light flooded the little gable, and stealing through the rustling branches, fell upon the face of Max Spencer.

This, he thought, was the reason why he had been requested to meet her there, preferring that romantic spot in which to tell him of her love.

He heard a footstep behind him. Turning hastily, he beheld the handsome Apollo, Leroy Beaumont, walking briskly along toward him.

He was much surprised to see him approaching and so was Leroy to find Mark proaching, and so was Leroy to find Mark there, for he stopped short and held up both hands, exclaiming:

"Mark Spencer!"
"Mr. Beaumont," returned the other, with a slight nod.
"Why are you here?" cried Beaumont.

"What right have you to ask?" calmly retorts: the young man.

His rival colored.
"Mr, you are impudent," said he,

"Then, sir, will you please to leave this place, as it is here that I am to meet a certain person?"

And with a haughty look the ostentatious fellow consulted his heavy gold watch.

"Minerva should have been here ere this," he muttered, as if to himself, but with a furtive glance at Mark Spencer to see what effect his words produced on him.

Mark was surprised; but pretending that he did not hear the words, he said:

"No, sir, I will not leave this place, for I, too, am waiting for a friend."

"You mean Miss Lambert?"

"I do"
"Then sir, you are a light?" oried Loroy

"Then, sir, you are a liar!" cried Leroy, ercely. "She did not ask you to meet her here."

"I beg your pardon, but—"
"Cease! hold your lying tongue!" thundered the handsome man, and the words were accompanied by a horrible oath.
"Audacious scoundrel! you know not that Minerva Lambert is soon to become my Minerva Lambert is soon to become my wife? She cares naught for you. Your jealousy prompted you to come here to witness our meeting, sh? "I'lis false!" replied Mark, quietly. "I knew not that such a meeting was in contemplation. But, sir, I have no desire to bandy words with you; therefore, I wish you good exeming."

you good evening."

He bowed and was about to withdraw from the spot, when Leroy, with another fierce and bitter oath, produced a pistol and pointed it at him.

Mark was no coward. He folded his arms and looked calmly into the dark muzarms and looked calmly into the dark muszle of the weapon.

"Shoot," said he; "shoot, Leroy Beaumont. I am unarmed."

"Peace, men!" cried a silvery voice.

They looked simultaneously, and beheld Minerva Lambert, standing there in the moonlight, her tall, queenly form clad in spotless white.

Mark lifted his hat politely, while his rival stood stock still, staring at her.

Minerva stepped proudly forward.

"Mr Beaumont," said she, confronting that gentleman, "I have witnessed your proceedings since you came here, and have overheard the conversation carried on be-proceedings since you came here, and have overheard the conversation carried on between you and Mr. Spencer. Sir, you have proved yourself a villain and a coward. You cursed Mr. Spencer without cause. You were going to shoot him even after he told you that he was unarmed. And besides, you told him that I was your promised wife, which you know is false. "You asked me this day for my heart and hand, as also did Mr. Spencer. I gave neither of you an answer, because I wished to carry out a little plan. I knew nothing of your past life, sir, nor whether you at present had the reputation of being good or bad. I could not think of joining my life to one who, comparatively speak-

"I planned this meeting with the hope that it might give me an insight into your true character, and I hoped not in vain. I desired to see your actions on confronting your rival here. I have seen. I am satisfied. Go, sir! never speak to me again, nor allow your footsteps to wander toward my home, which you have so often visited as a wolf in sheep's clothing."

Pale and trembling Leroy Beaumont lis tened to this speech, cowering before the accusing gaze of those flashing eyes like a criminal receiving his sentence.

When she had finished she stood erect, and for a moment a bitter retort seemed to tremble on his lips. It remained un-heart.

Now, they had both proposed. This very day they had been both at her feet, pouring fourth the story of their love, and begging for hers in return.

Of course, they did not do this at the same time, but at different hours of the day, and neither knew of the other's proposal.

When he was lost to view in the darkness, Minerva turned to Mark who had been a silent spectator of the little drama that had just been performed, and said in a trembling voice:

"As to that, Miss Lambert," he replied,

She hit upon a plan which pleased her, and she immediately began the execution hear it now?"

"Not now. To morrow, is you wish, "Not now. To morrow, is you wish,"

you may see me at home."

And on the following day Mark Spenser, with throbbing heart, sat beside his love.
When she felt his strong arm stealing around her trembling form—when she felt father's house."

It was all she wrote. She knew they would both be at the appointed spot at the appointed time, each thinking himself the favored suitor.

She was thinking of this as she sat alone as the piezza, where the long evening shadows were creeping across the floor and the rays of the setting sun were struggling through the ne work of vines to kiss her blushing cheek.

She could think of no better way of finding out whether Leroy Beaumont was a true gentleman or not.

It was to see how he would act on finding his rival at the place of meeting, that she had concluded to make this appointment with both.

If her plan failed, she would contrive another, for she had resolved that no man should become her husband unless he was in every respect worthy of her.

Mark Spencer stood beneath the widespreading branches of the old elm tree, leaning against its huge trunk with his arms folded on his breast.
