

welcome wherever fortune may happen to bring him.

The summer tourist who visits New Brunswick will carry back many happy memories, and perchance induce some few others of that vast throng of those who occasionally seek the change of air and scene and the delights of travel to return in the following year, and inspect for themselves some few of the many pleasant places which I have attempted briefly to describe, and amid the varied attractions of New Brunswick find that refreshment of mind and body so grateful to the toilers in large cities.

"They come! the merry months of beauty, song and flowers,
They come! the gladsome months that bring thick leatiness to bowers.
Up! up! my heart, and walk abroad;
fling work and care aside,
Seek silent hills, or rest thyself, where
peaceful waters glide:
Or underneath the shadow vast of
patriarchal tree,
See through its leaves the cloudless
sky in rapt tranquility."
