postman's knock as she sat down to her solitary breakfast in her prim little dining-room on the first of April, 18-; and her little servant brought the missive into the room as she poured out her first cup of coffee. It was a handsome envelope with an elegant monogram upon it- a monogram Miss Cameron did not know, and it looked like a gentleman's handwriting, she said to herself, with a little vonder, for her correspondents were all ladies There was a time when Miss Cameron had received billet-doux, and even yet she was handsome ; but in a village where single women abound they are set aside as old maids as soon as the tongues of their rivals can effect the operation, and Margaret Cameron had made no resistance. She was very well off, living in her own house on a good come; and she was a little afraid of that sort of impecunious man that offers itself to every woman with money until it finds a victim.

teens, with a young soldier who died on the battle-field. Two other men had been very much in love with her. Since then she had had offers that were rather a trouble than a triumph. Heavy, solemn widowers, who wanted housekeepers ; bachelors of the prudent sort. She regretted no one but the dead soldier, and even him only mildly after all those years ; and as we began to say letters from gentlemen were so rare that this one surprised her. She opened it carefully, drawing from its decorated envelope a sheet of paper that was really elegant, and began to read as follows :--- read as follows:--CROSS HOUSE, March 20th. MY DEAR MADAM: Do you believe in love at first sight' I confess I do, though I have lived on earth for fifty years with-out experiencing it until to-day. To-day, my dear lady, I met you. I followed you for a long distance (pardon the liberty which I confess), and I must say that you inspired me with the tenderest emotions-emotions, however, I beg to assure you, as respectful as they were ardent. In a word, I desire to offer you my addresses. I sm a bachelor, a man of good social position and ample means. You can discover my character by inquiring of my neighbors, my friends, and our clergyman-for we at-tend the same church. May I not have the privilege of calling upon you? A re-ply will be esteemed not only a favor but a condescension.
