THE MODERN WAY.

First American father—I hear your daughter is going to be married.
Second American father—So I understand.—Judge.

SUPERSTITIOUS.

"No; he beat it."—Boston Herald.

And in the climate itself there is charm of the undress. In its cham ing aspects it is like the west coast of Ireland. During the winter season rain squalls spring up at any moment, transforming a scene of solitude into one of tempestuous fury. Then does all English-Blarritz hurry out-of-doors to view an atmospheric spectacle of surpassing grandeur. An hour later the rain and wind subside as suddenly as they came, the storm clouds pass away the sun shines forth, and, thanks to the sandy suboil the streets dry as if by magic.

On a clear day in Blarritz the view from the high cliff on which stands the lighthouse is a magnificent panorama of mountain, sea and sky. Look to the south and you see a jagged, curving coast-line, with long stretches of white sand interspersed with clusters of dark rocks over all of which white foam breaks in iridescent gleams. Further on still, where the curving coast bends abruptly towards the west, you will notice a gap. That is the mouth of the Eildasson and the frontier of France and Spain. Behind making an effective background to this tableau, rise the foothills of the Pyrenees.

BEAUTIFUL SCENERY.

Further to the west one almost imagines that the turtle-backed Cape Ortegal can be seen dipping its nose into the Atlantic and the British visitor knows that round that rocky corner is the port of Ferrol whence the famous Armada sailed for the invasion of England. Turn towards the north from the lighthouse cliff and the "lovers' walk" unfolds itself at your feet. This is a five-mile stretch of shimmering sandy beach, extending to the mouth of the Adour, where once more we come upon historic ground. The background on this side is a pine wood which comes down close to the sea flanking the whole length of the beach. In the hunting season this wood resounds to the British cry of "Tally ho!" mingled with its Gallicised version as given by French huntsmen.

Probably it was because its ever-changing beauty harmonized with her own impulsive wayward nature that this part of the Biscayan coast appealed so especially to the beautiful Spanish girl, Eugenie de Montijo, who knew

Watts thought, as Spatis strode off.

Mme. Gould's future were earnestly discussed.
After announcing that he would soon depart for home and that Mme. Gould would return to Paris when her health permitted, Prince deignan said at the Waldorf-Astoria tonight:
"I want to deny emphatically the report that we have already been mar-
