sed to the mind. The young heart is by nature exquisitively tender—yet there is no animal in creation undergoes so sudden a change to hardness, when accustomed to scenes of cruelty. The passions of the young, though strong, seldom impel them to take life; it requires time and an acquaintance with the frequency of these deeds to effect the change; whence it is that both murderers and executioners are most frequently committed by persons more favored in age. The vengeance of the law may appear only to affect the guilty, but its limits are indefinite, and whenever it is divulged, whether in public executions or in newspaper reports, evil more or less is wrought. Although man must be subject to laws and penalties, yet their operation ought not to be rendered injurious to society. If means cannot be devised to silence the press, let government abolish the public punishment of death; this may tend to do away with the interest the public have in the cases of evil doers, until it dwindle away altogether. We all agree that scenes of violence, in which the lower animals only are the sufferers, operate perniciously on the human character; yet few consider how much more the public execution of human beings must have a tendency to harden the depraved, and ignorant into a state of hopeless insusceptibility to the operations of all ordinary modes of moral impression and conviction of error.
