R. MCKAY & CO.

A Spanish Beauty

They separated and went to their respective rooms, the colonel to pack his belongings with his own hands. He tried to dress for dinner. In the midst of the colonel's labor, his host's valet tapped at the door and entered. "My master's compliments, Monsieur Colonel, and will you drive with him to Sarsdale? The car is waiting." "Tell your master to be good enough to make my apologies, Antoine," he said, looking up from his work. "I do not dine at Sarsdale Hall to-day." The Swiss valet bowed and left the room, and the colonel resumed his packing. It did not take long—the May sun set was its brightest when he had done. He looked at his watch, paced up and down a few moments in deep thought, then hastily rang the bell. "Saddle my horse and bring him round at once," was his order. "Has your master gone?" "Yes; half an hour ago," the servant said. And, his command being obeyed, in a few minutes he was riding rapidly in the direction of Warbeck Hall. "One must not steal away like a thief," he muttered, between his teeth. "Besides, after what escaped me to-day, I must explain before we part forever." The early twilight was falling like a silvery mist as he strode into the long, dusky drawing room, and despatched his card by a servant to the Lady Evelyn Desmond. "Tell her I come to say farewell," he added. "I will detain her but a moment." He walked to one of the long, lace-draped windows overlooking the park, with rich, dark ivy and dog-roses clustering thick around it. Further than he could see there spread a fair vista of lawn and woodland, with the glimmer of running water, and the scent of wild, sweet roses. "I will see it again in dreams," he thought, "under the stars of the prairie, or among the western wilds, or perhaps, when some Indian bullet ends a life of little use to any one on earth." "You wished to see me—you are going away?" a low, soft voice murmured. He had not heard her, so absorbed had he been. She had crossed the length of the room without sound. She stood beside him, glancing up with dark, starry eyes into his face. "Is it true?" she asked, a tremor in the sweet voice. "Do you really go so soon?" "Would to God I had gone long ago!" he burst forth, passionately. "Would to God I had never come! I should not then have been false to friendship and to honor. I should not then have said the words I was mad enough and base enough to say to you to-day. But in your danger I forgot everything else, Lady Evelyn, the only explanation I can make is to go and never look upon your face again; to carry my secret with me, and bury it with me when I die, in the land I have left. Will you say farewell, and I forgive you, before I go?" She had grown white as death. She stared straight out at the misty moonrise, and seeing nothing. "You do not speak. I have been too mad and presumptuous, and my sin of loving you—is beyond pardon. Well, I deserve it. I have been false to the friend whose bread I have broken; false from the first instant I looked upon your face. I, a penniless soldier. Yes, silent scorn is surely answer enough for me." She turned and looked at him. The depths of self-scorn, and something she could not understand, in his tone, roused her. "What do you mean?" she said, slowly. "You are good enough for a princess. But you are right—you must go, and at once. I can echo your prayer—it would have been better you had never come—better for you—better for me." Her voice broke over the last words. But his face lighted, his eyes glowed. "Lady Evelyn," he said, "for pity's sake, tell me—had you been free, had I seen of your own rank, could you have learned to love me?" The violet eyes turned at him full of great reproach. "It is cruel to ask that," she said; "but if it will comfort you any—yes, had I been free—Oh, why speak of this? As for rank, you are only greater than I, better, braver, nobler! I never knew until to-day what a base, utterly despicable creature I am—weak and unstable as water. See what I have done! To please my father, I have given myself to a man I do not love—an honorable gentleman, who trusts me and believes in me. I have pledged my word, and see how I keep it. No one—not he, when he hears this—and hear it he must—can despise me as I despise myself. It is useless wishing we had never met. Our expiation, as you say, must be in parting at once and forever. Farewell, Colonel Drummond! Forget me; I am not worthy of a remembrance." She extended her right hand, the other covered her face. He spoke no word; he raised the hand she extended to his lips. It was his silent adieu. A moment later and she was alone. She stood there long, rigid, and still. The ringing of the dinner-bell aroused her; the heart breaks, but we must dine. She turned mechanically and walked away. At the same instant a resplendent figure raised itself from the wilderness of ivy and tangled fern and roses beneath the window. It was Vivian Trevanion, there by the merest accident, and who had heard every word. CHAPTER X. The man who called himself Colonel Drummond mounted his horse and rode away from the lodge-gate, whether he knew or not. Never before—no, not when doomed to a felon's death for the murder of Kathleen O'Neal—not when the woman he was to wed, the coronet he should have worn, the friend who should have been as a brother, were all alike false and lost to him—had the bitterness at his heart been so deep and deadly as now. For at twenty we love but lightly, and though our hearts are well-nigh broken to-day, Youth and Hope heal the wound, and we smile and eat our dinner to-morrow, and postpone suicide and despair to a more auspicious season. But at forty, with buoyant youth behind us, love is deeper and sorrow stronger, and not all the College of Physicians can heal the wounds the winged god inflicts. He rode on through the starry May night, whether his horse chose to go. He had given up everything in his lost love for this plighted bride of another—the hope of the past twenty years, the vindication of his honor, the eternal resignation of his rights. Gerald Desmond would not have spared. Jus-

OUR SHEEP.

Breeders Dispose of Stock and Win Prizes at Chicago Fair.

Minister of Agriculture of Alberta a Guest.

Chicago, Ill., Dec. 3.—As the judging of sheep has been finished the Canadian stock men at the International Stock Show disposed of most of the animals to-day, and left for their homes well pleased with the fine showing they had made. The Canadian breeders will not take back a large number of their animals, having disposed of nearly all of them at fancy figures. One Canadian ram sold for $900 and many of the ewes brought correspondingly large prices. In the Leicester class, which was not judged until this morning, A. & A. W. Whitelaw, of Guelph, took every first prize in that class. The entries in this class were not numerous, but the stock was all of blue ribbon calibre. The winning Leicesters were all bred on the Whitelaw farm, near Guelph. With the blue ribbons for the champions in this class goes the silver cup offered by Sir William Cooper, of Shenstone, England. In the Dorset class, L. Parkinson, also of Guelph, took first and third prizes for ewe lambs. Mr. Alfred Clare, son of Mr. George Clare, of the Canadian Parliament, was an interested visitor at the show to-day. Hon. Duncan Marshall, Minister of Agriculture of the Province of Alberta, was the guest of honor at a luncheon at the Saddle and Siroloin Club to-day. He stated that the production of that province has increased over 75,000 in the last year. Mr. Marshall also told the dinner of the wonderful opportunities for the farmer and stock raiser in Western Canada. Another prominent visitor at the show has been Sir George Drummond, of Brantford, Quebec. The Huntleywood farms, owned by him, have taken a majority of the prizes in the Southdown classes. The baronet expresses himself as very much pleased over the showing made by Canada at this year's exposition, and predicts another large exhibition of Canadian stock next year.

BOY SHOT.

Killed by Shot Fired by Indian Doctor.

Boys Were Disturbing Performance in Hall and Doctor Fired.

Sudbury, Dec. 3.—D. Whitecloud, an Indian patent medicine doctor, is lodged in Copper Cliff jail facing a charge of homicide. On Wednesday night while performing in a public hall he claims to have been disturbed by small boys outside. "Coming to the door, rifle in hand, he fired, shooting Willie Swede, an 11-year-old boy. The lad lingered between life and death for 36 hours, and finally succumbed to peritonitis. Arrested on the charge of wounding Whitecloud pleaded guilty yesterday, but will not have to answer the more serious crime of the boy's death. Whitecloud is more or less famous as an Indian doctor throughout old Ontario. At the inquest, to-night the jury returned a verdict that Willie Swede came to his death through a bullet wound from a rifle fired by James Whitecloud. Mrs. McAuley and Bennett performed an autopsy, showing that the bullet had passed through a notch in the hip bone, and perforated the bowels in twelve places. Contrary to Whitecloud's evidence the previous day, before the boy's death, when he stated that the bullet was only wax, the ball found by the doctors was a lead one of 22-caliber. Of the shooting there was only the evidence of two little boys, from whom it was gained a market both inside and outside of the hall where Whitecloud was giving his show. Just previous to the shooting the noise was being made outside the hall, and Whitecloud, coming to the door, rifle in hand, looked for the boys. Apparently the Swede boy was the only one in sight, the mischief-makers having disappeared, and he being partly passing the hall on his way home, received the shot.

BAIL CANCELLED.

Bondsman For Barrie Women Grew Suspicious.

Barrie, Ont., Dec. 3.—Miss Clara Guthrie, who with her mother was a few days ago committed for trial on a charge of perjury, arising out of the enquiry into the fire which destroyed the Music Hall block and the Guthrie residence, both being admitted to bail, was to-day rearrested and lodged in jail. It appears that Mr. James Goodman, the bondsman, learned that Mrs. Guthrie and her husband had left town, and, fearing that the daughter might also go away, cancelled his $250 surety. Miss Guthrie when arrested stated that she could give no information as to her mother's whereabouts, as she had been in attendance on Miss Montgomery, adopted daughter of the Guthries, who has been confined to bed since she injured herself by a fall after fainting in the witness box during the fire inquest. Later Miss Montgomery was removed to the hospital, and two little sons of Mrs. Guthrie were temporarily placed in charge of the Children's Aid Society. MANY TENANTS EVICTED. Employees of a Massachusetts Concern Sleep on the Highway. Ludlow, Mass., Dec. 2.—Six hundred evicted tenants of the Ludlow Manufacturing Associates were notified to-night that unless they removed their household goods from the streets to-morrow morning the property would be stored by the town authorities. Nearly one hundred of the three hundred operatives evicted to-day slept in the streets to-night in little shacks made of their possessions. A goodly supply of food and money for their benefit has been furnished by generous citizens. When there's nothing to do, the devil has his sleeves rolled up.—Manchester Union.
