"I hope you are not ready to give up the search?' returned his companion, with a merry twinkle in his eye.

"But isn't it like hunting for a needle in a haystack?

"I do remember em," growled Harry. "That's what makes me feel so confounded blue. If we fail to find the treasure we fail to win the prizes. The prospect is anything but pleasant."

"Cheer up, old fellow! Our failure is anything but a settled fact. We must sharpen our wits-that's all. Let us look at the map again. "Bah! it tells nothing."

"The clue is vague enough, the Lord He drew from his pocket a folded paper the sons of honorable and well-to do parents, and had been close friends from their exciest childhood. Though only twenty years old, both were deeply in love. The objects of their youthful passions were twin sisters-bright sparkling girls blooming on their pathway. These girls though enjoying the universal esteem and admiration which their excellent qualities and personal beauty justly won for them, were the daughters of a very eccentric and unpopular man -an old miser, whose chief ambition in life was to accumulate and hoa d up money. Being an invalid, however, confined to the house by an incurable case of rheumatism, he had small chance to indulge his passion through his own individual efforts; in consequence
