Irish Problem Still Acute

A REMARKABLE feature about Irish history, and particularly about that history in recent years, is pointed out by the Christian Science Monitor, one of the few important newspapers in the United States which has always viewed the position of the Ulster Unionists with favor. It is that whenever a solution of the final decision of her great problem seemed imminent something has always turned up to postpone or destroy it. The Irish question is a far from being settled by agreement today as it has been since Gladstone introduced his first Home Rule bill. There is just as firmly opposed to Home Rule as ever, although Ulster's position has been modified of late years by an admission that Nationalist Ireland has a right to govern herself as she chooses. The other Irish provinces want Home Rule, but they admit that if you let the Ulster Unionists have their way, the Irish nation will be divided into two parts, one of which will be a free state and the other will be a province under British rule. Five years ago the British government had been so far from settling the Irish question that it had to call a general election. The result was a victory for the Unionists. The British government then had to call another general election. The result was a victory for the Unionists. The British government then had to call another general election.
