THE TOBIQUE TRAGEDY.

The Three Suspects Committed on a Charge of Wilful Murder.

Major Howe's Story of the Killing of His Wife. The first act in the Tobique tragedy was the shooting of the coroner's jury brought in a verdict that Susan Howe had come to her death in the hands of William Day, Frank Traflet and Henry Phillips, and that these men were guilty of wilful murder. The evidence is very strong against some of the prisoners, but it is doubtful whether it will be sufficient to bring a jury to convict them or murder. Day, the oldest man of the three, says he can prove an alibi. The others also make innocent. To a correspondent Phillips said that he was native of London, England, but came to this province two years ago from Halifax; he says he arrived in the Annapolis valley two years ago, and that his father who died about a year ago was for a time the agent of the Tobique river. He says he was the Societe Postal d'Annapolis. He says his people were at one time very wealthy. Further details of the awful affair state that on Saturday night two men with firearms appeared in front of Major Howe's tent and began preparations for shooting salmon. They were the late George H. Howe, and his brother-in-law, George N. Edger, of Fredericton, and Carrie Bustin of Stanley.
