The Australian Medical Journal tells of man a portion of whose skull, measuring a man a portion of whose skull, measuring in the by inches by inch, had been carried away by a circular saw. His wound healed easily in twenty-seven days, and he put up with a baid head with much equanimity. The paper describes him as being of "a placid and unexcitable temperament," and the surgeons seem to think he was somewhat amused by the accident.

Lady Brassey has contracted with a yacht building firm to construct for her a sailing boat of twenty-seven feet length on the lines of the curious "viking ship," of which a model was shown at the late Shipwrights' company's exhibition. This boat will be lugger rigged, and will have a sliding keel, an appendage probably unknown in the viking days. Lady Brassey intends rowing and sailing in this extraordinary craft about Cowes Roads next year.

An Indiana girl, deciding to change her manner of life from good to bad, desired that all who knew her might believe her dead, while she came east under an assumed name. She wrote a letter saying that she was about to commit suicide by drowning was about to commit suicide by drowning in the Ohio river. Then she left some of her clothes on the bank and made her escape in the night. But a railroad conductor recognized her, veiled and muffled though she was, and her scheme therefore did not deceive, though all search has failed to find her.

denominations urged the abolition of seat-selling, on the grounds of both right and expediency; but the Rev. Edward Abbott of Cambridge spoke on the other side of the question. The rich needed the gospel as much as the poor, he thought, and many families would not go to church at all if they could not have the seats they wanted. they could not have the seats they wanted. His opinion was decidedly that more than half the congregations would be destroyed if free seats should become general.

According to a writer in the British Medical Journal, the opium habit may be discontinued with perfect safety and without discomfort by gradually reducing the doses of morphia, and substituting bromide of potassium in increasing doses. The point is to keep up the proper proportion between the two drugs, and hence the necessity of medical supervision. It has been said that such modes of cure simply substitute one bad habit for another; but it should be borne in mind that a bromide habit is easily cured, while the opium habit sticks considerably closer than a brother.
