"THE LATE TENANT"

By GORDON HOLMES

For a little drop of acutest poison had found her mother, stiff and self-conscious, with my work, she was so anxious to have some one to gossip with. Bless your the village. In the bar overnight he heard yokels talking of the need of money at the big house, how Van Hupfeldt's money to hold of violets (of all flowers in creation). Strange, most unutterably strange, the big house, how Van Hupfeldt's money to have some one to gossip with. Bless your 'eart, miss, I know your name as well as my own."

Strange, most unutterably strange, the with a gold with tonhole of violets (of all flowers in crewould make the flowers grow again in Rigsworth. He smiled at the conceit then; now he knew that deadly nightshade was sown in the garden of his hopes, for he imagined that money had proven more potent than love.

It was a remarkable thing that of all the pictures in the flat he had left un.

It was a remarkable thing that of all the pictures in the flat he had left untouched the portrait in chalk which hung over the dining-room fireplace. It savored Mr. Dibbin from his office today. He had some hunging to have an uncanny trick of reading her thoughts when they were hostile, explained instantly: "Not all my persuasions could bring over the dining-room fireplace. It savored Mr. Dibbin from his office today. He too much of sacrilege to disturb that had some business engagement which was ethereal face; but David was in far too imperative, he said. but I have done the ethereal face; but David was in far too savage a mood to check at sentiment during those dark hours. He surveyed the portrait almost vindictively, though had he been less bitter he might have seen a reassuring smile in the parted lips. So it came to pass that, after eating some dry bread, which was the only food he found in the larder, he lit a pipe, looked at the picture again, and yielded to the impulse to examine it.

My Poor Girl—At last, then, you force the miserable truth from me. Mrs. Strauss is my wife. She is twice my age. She forced me to marry her ten years ago for her money. She is, indeed, dying, and then I can fly to you. For the sake of our boy, forgive me.

"Ah!" There was something sadly an imal in David's triumph. He felt like a dog which has seized the rat after which it has been straining, and, in a minute or time, he had the grace to be ashamed of himself. Then he thought of Violet, and he broke down, crying like a child. Those tears were good for him; they brought him back to sanity and garnished the dark places in his heart.

Strong as were his nerves, he had to force himself to apply a knife to its brown-papered back. And then, with a queer vindictive howd of triumph, he drew forth a curiously insipid portrait of Van Hupfeldt, inscribed "To Gwen," with a date, and, folded behind it, a terrible litter of the note, merely dated "Paris; Tuesday," which read:
