ALWAYS SOMETHING.

If one is bound to have the blues, and grumble like the deuce, then he faces wrong and misery and strife; oh, something always comes along to take the joy from life. He has a small attack of flu, and it has knocked him flat; he stands around and says "Kerchoo!" and stronger words than that. He tells his woes to other cranks, in voice of doleful pitch, and doesn't give a word of thanks that he is spared the itch. The day is dismal, and he brays, and tears his hair and robe, and he forgets the pleasant days when sunshine soaked the globe. He sadly wails the same old song, or plays it on a fife: "There's always something comes along to take the joy from life." And when one views the world like this, he is a hopeless case; he wouldn't know a slice of bliss if pushed against his face. A ton of grief upon this hick is, most securely cinched, and he would make some kind of kick if he were being lynched.
