The High Low Price

By RUTH CAMERON

HERE is a certain condition of modern business against which I wish the women of this country would in some way protest...

Again, I am constantly finding blotters that do not make any pretense of blotting, at least not in the desirable sense...

How often we find envelopes which have no intention whatever of being stuck together. The glue upon them is so scarce or of such inferior quality that it is impossible to make the envelope actually envelope anything without an auxiliary in the shape of some more glue or a dab of sealing wax.

And surely you have noticed how much more easily the pencils of the present day break than those which we used to buy ten or twenty years ago.

Very good business for the manufacturer, but not so good for that unfortunate under dog, the consumer.

When the manufacturers of the world, and Connecticut received a nickname that will probably last her for life.

Now to me this is one of the most pernicious manifestations of the high cost of living.

What can women do about all this, you ask? Well, they simply use the only weapon left to the consumer; they can refuse to consume.

Shoddiness and cheapness—not inexpensive, mind you, but the cheapness which is most costly in the end—are the curses of the age.

Evenly with soft violet colored icing, and in the center of each press a large candied violet.

Either fresh or canned rhubarb may be used. Take enough for one pie, about a half pint, and stir into it while boiling a heaping teaspoonful of corn starch mixed with the yolks of two eggs, a cupful of sugar and one tablespoonful of butter.

Have ready a pie tin lined with a nice crust already baked. Spread this with the rhubarb mixture and cover with a meringue made of the whites of the eggs, beaten stiff, with two-tablespoonfuls of sugar.

With regard to the French embassy in Vienna, just vacated by M. Crozier, whose term of office has aged him considerably, and who insisted upon retiring, France has vainly endeavored to comply with Austria's pressing request for an envoy who, as a member of the old French aristocracy, would have the entrée to the inner court circle, and the inner circle in Vienna.

There are plenty of old noble families left in France, but any member thereof is unwilling to represent the present government in a diplomatic capacity, while those few who might consent to do so, are open to such suspicion of disloyalty to the republic, as to render their appointment neither politic nor possible.

The republic has already had one such experience—when the late Duke de La Rochefoucauld, during the decade following the Franco-German war, was envoy to the Court of St. James, and made a hasty trip from London to Paris to cast his vote for his seat in the chamber of debate against the republic and in favor of restoring the monarchy.

He was a grand seigneur of the old school, a man of great wealth, but so straight minded, that he was overwhelmed with surprise when, in the following week, the republic asked him to resign his ambassadorship.

In default of a nobleman, the French government has therefore appointed to the Embassy in Vienna, a diplomat of the name of Humme, a bourgeois, but a man with thirty years service behind him in Berlin, as Charge d'affaires, and especially in Munich, minister plenipotentiary.

In the latter post he was a general favorite and, thanks to the intimate intercourse between the Austrian and Bavarian courts and aristocracy, there is no doubt that he will be strongly recommended in his new position by the royal and noble friends whom he left at the old one.

The very manner in which he was obliged to leave Munich endeared him to that extremely Catholic court, for when, soon after the rupture of official relations between the Nation and France, he, as deus ex machina, was called upon to represent the diplomatic corps in the Bavarian capital and in compliance with strict diplomatic usage, called upon to represent the republic in Munich, he, as deus ex machina, was called upon to represent the republic in Munich, he, as deus ex machina, was called upon to represent the republic in Munich.

Many Things to Think About in Appointing Ambassadors—Some Cases in Point

(Copyright, 1912, by the Brewster Company)

In order to understand the diplomat's unpleasantness which France has encountered of late from both Russia and Austria, it must be explained that each of these empires has privately urged her, in the most pressing manner, to send to their respective courts an ambassador selected from the old aristocracy.

Indeed, a bourgeois French ambassador is subjected, together with his family, to something very much akin to a social boycott, rendered all the more marked by the fact that any well-born secretary or attaches that he may have are invited where he is excluded—which of course does not gravely impair the prestige of his mission, and his usefulness to his country.

This is the secret of the extraordinary demand made by the Russian government, through its minister of foreign affairs, Sazonoff, for the transfer of the French envoy, M. Georges Louis, from St. Petersburg, a message conveyed through the Muscovite ambassador in Paris, Baron Ivolosky.

The Baron went so far as to intimate that the presence of Monsieur Louis in St. Petersburg was interfering with the sympathetic understanding between the two allies.

It seems that M. Louis and his wife, during the last season in St. Petersburg were invited nowhere, excepting, of course, to those official functions at which Louis' position as ambassador rendered his presence obligatory. In consequence, he never had an opportunity of seeing Monsieur Sazonoff and his colleagues socially, and establishing that friendly footing which is essential to the fulfilment of his diplomatic mission.

It follows that Ambassador Louis found himself exposed to charges on the part of Russia to the effect that he had failed to keep the two nations in touch and had misconstrued and even misunderstood the communications made him by the Russian foreign office for transmission to Paris.

So unpleasant was the tone of the Russian request for the recall of Ambassador Louis that the French government at first refused compliance. But, realizing on second thought that the Franco-Russian alliance upon which so much depends and which Germany is extremely anxious to break might be endangered if France should resolve to go in person to St. Petersburg to discuss the matter personally with the Czar, the prime minister and Sazonoff.

Whatever the outcome may be, M. Louis will have to go, his withdrawal being the more unpleasant to France because his predecessor, M. Bompard, was withdrawn for similar reasons, at the instance of the Russian government.

Bompard is now accredited to Stamboul, where he does not presently tend to promote the cause of France, as Sazonoff's ally. Oddly enough, Georges Louis was sent to St. Petersburg some years ago, on the strength of the recommendation from the late King Edward VII. M. Louis was for years the political director and secretary of the French legation in St. Petersburg, and was indeed the head of the permanent staff of the foreign office.

As such, he had been brought to the attention of Edward VII, who, when visiting Paris both before and after his accession to the throne, was accustomed to invite him often to lunch and found much pleasure and interest in his conversation.

This favor shown by the English king to Louis was undoubtedly of use to the English interests, when the king urged his appointment as ambassador to Russia, and wrote so pleasantly about him to his nephew the Czar, that the latter accepted him as person, and he seems not to have sufficiently considered the attitude and prejudices of St. Petersburg's great world, of which he knew comparatively little, his visits there having been few and far between.

Edward VII was a good judge of men, but his advocacy of Georges Louis is an afraid must be set down as one of his mistakes.

His special field of historical research will be in eastern Canada, especially in the maritime provinces. No man is better adapted for this work than Mr. Milner. Mr. Milner for many years has taken the keenest interest in the early history of the maritime provinces, especially the local history of Cumberland and Westmorland counties. While preparing a lot of fish at New Bedford, Manuel Goulet of that city found a diamond ring in a large tautog. He took the ring to a jeweller, who offered him $30 for it, but Goulet declined the offer because he interpreted the jeweller's eagerness to pay $30 to mean that the ring was worth much more. 'FOR 15 YEARS I HAD ECZEMA'. Mr. C. E. Cramer, farmer, Cranenburg, Sask., writes: 'For fifteen years I had eczema and for about six years also suffered from itching piles. Seven different doctors were consulted in Canada and the United States, with only temporary relief. The eczema started on the legs and there was almost constant itching and smarting. Sometimes I would have to scratch half the night and get little or no rest or sleep. The very first application of Dr. Chase's Ointment brought relief and after the third application the itching stopped entirely. I now believe the cure to be complete and attribute it to Dr. Chase's Ointment and Nerve Food. The latter was used to enrich the blood, while the Ointment healed up the sores. I am ready to take my oath that this statement is true and correct.'
