The British people are becoming quite warmed up in the matter. The Lord Mayor of London has called a meeting for this week in the Guild Hall, which is to be addressed by Messrs, Asquith and Balfour, and other leading men. The Liberals, following the lead of Sir Edward Grey's speeches, are enthusiastic for a permanent peace. Among Mr. Balfour's following some dissentient voices are raised; the Morning Post, for example, objects to the mass meeting, asks the Lord Mayor to call it off, and urges Mr. Balfour at any rate not to countenance the affair by his presence on the platform. But the Post is and Mr. Balfour has promised. The arbitration treaty will soon be the Oxford graft case:

"The result is especially unfortunate because of the history of the case, in this neighborhood it is well known that Buchanan has boasted from the first that he would not "go down," or that if he did "go down" he would not go alone. He did not make any pretence that there would be any inclination to save him for his own sake; his boast was that it would be necessary to protect him for the sake of others who would be inclined in his hoast. They have waited anxiously to see the outcome, and now they see that Buchanan has made good in spite of the fact that there were indictments against him on five charges, and that he pleaded guilty to three, he has not gone down. What are the people of Oxford County to make of it all:

"What has become of the fact that there charges, and that he pleaded guilty to three, he has not gone down. What are the people of Oxford County to make of it all:

"What has become of the other charges against Buchanan" What is to become of them" Why were they "triversed? Why was there so much anxiety to finish up the cases in a horry? Again, what about Buchanan could not enter into a conspiracy alone, if he was guilty to oxide the property of the prosecut state of the law to secure conviction, but at any rate the crown authorities could have done their best."
