

On October 11, 1977, the House of Commons passed the CPaC Bill, which would create the Canadian Public Air Corporation. The Bill would create a new public corporation to operate a national television network.

The CPaC Bill would create a new public corporation to operate a national television network. The Bill would create a new public corporation to operate a national television network.

(CPaC)

The CPaC Bill would create a new public corporation to operate a national television network. The Bill would create a new public corporation to operate a national television network.

The CPaC Bill would create a new public corporation to operate a national television network. The Bill would create a new public corporation to operate a national television network.

SUMMARY OF THE CPaC PROPOSAL

The Canadian cable television industry has been slow to develop. The CPaC Bill would create a new public corporation to operate a national television network.

The Canadian cable television industry and the CPaC Bill would create a new public corporation to operate a national television network.

The CPaC Bill would create a new public corporation to operate a national television network. The Bill would create a new public corporation to operate a national television network.

Canada will benefit from a significantly enhanced service to more diverse and numerous citizens.