WORLD PATTERN DEPARTMENT

No. 2413 .-- A PRACTICAL PLAY APRON. Every small maiden finds plenty of dirt to get into, and unless her frocks are protected in some sufficient way they are sure to become soiled. Here is sketched a small apron of gingham, which covers the wearer so completely that it might serve for a dress. The round yoke supports the full body portion, which has tucks to short waist depth. The sleeves are bishop, and may be in short puff if a nicer apron is desired. A convenient pocket appears at one side of the front, which may hold the handkerchief-that very illusive article. For a muslin or lawn apron, the yoke may be cut away in round neck and broad ties may fashion a bow in back. For the medium size 3 yards of 36-inch material are needed subordinates. The first result was an alteration in the language of the men of the period. Conversations of general—not particular—interest were insisted upon by her. From this time specialized and technical terms began to vanish from the language of the period, and words became fuller and broader in their meanings. Women were no longer looked upon as 4dealized dolls, but worthy of friendship and respect as the intellectual equals of the men. Men had to learn to cultivate and refine their perceptions and finesse, and to know how to praise, blame, or criticize in delicate terms expressing a thousand shades of meaning. health.

Thus polite society came into existence in France, until to-day it is look-ed upon as a national characteristic. It was the fashion of the day to pretend to be in love even if one were not so in reality. The art of courtship had become a condition of scientific terms with men, and discussed earn-estly questions of culture and refine-ment. Up to this time women were looked upon as dignified and ignorant subordinates. The first result was an
