poses in certain countries, such as Spain, China, Yugoslavia, Taiwan or the Soviet Union, much less to determine the qualifications of appropriate medical specialists in those countries, to use the wording of the amendment proposed in committee. In those cases the state concerned designates the local examining medical practitioners and occasionally accedes to request for medical consultations when these are required. Departmental medical officials ordinarily do not have any direct contact with these physicians. They certainly do not have any control with respect to their designation.

Another point worth bearing in mind is the incongruity of the so-called medical specialists in India, Japan, Lebanon, Ghana or Afghanistan, opining for example, on the subject of, and I quote the amendment passed by the committee, "excessive demands on health or social services" in Canada with respect to health impairment discerned in an immigrant applicant in one of those countries, assuming that the requirement for, and I again quote the amendment, "consultation with the appropriate medical specialist", as the amended version reads, applies to Section 19.

The hon. member raised questions as to costs. He went out of his way to point out that the applicant immigrants are paying for the medical specialist consultations. I suspect that what he proposed would end up hurting sick people whom he claims he would want to help. It is estimated that for approximately every 2,000 immigrants there might be as many as 50,000 cases where it would be appropriate to have a consultation with a medical specialist.

Let us assume a consultation fee of about $100 per immigrant. It immediately adds an additional $5 million to potential immigrants who will have to bear that particular cost. As the hon. member knows, many of these people come to Canada with relatively small means, especially if they suffer from a particular health impairment.

As to the figure of $2.5 million about which the hon. member was concerned, it is related essentially to having medical immigration officers from the department and medical specialists appear in litigation procedures and the costs arising therefrom.
