LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Socialism and the Church

Editor Times and Star: Sir,—Having read the letter referring to the "Church and Socialism," which appears in your paper over the non-deplorable name of a "working man," I am constrained to enter the controversy if only to enlighten the writer thereof.

He admits practically that social conditions are far from perfect and then he points to the church as the best organization to help suffering humanity.

The writer ought to know that the Christian religion will never be able to alter the conditions; if any set of people wish that to be done they have to set to work and do it for themselves, or in other words, must create a public desire for a change. This is what I contend that Socialists are doing.

What was the Christian religion in the past? It was a religion of peace and love, for after more than 1900 years of Christian effort, not more than one person in sixty of the present generation has been truly converted to Christ. At that rate it will take a very long time for anything to materialize to sweep away poverty by the aid of Christianity.

What was the church in the past? It was a church of the poor, and the poor were the backbone of the church. It was a church of the people, and the people were the backbone of the church.

It was a church of the workers, and the workers were the backbone of the church. It was a church of the honest, and the honest were the backbone of the church.
