BELL'S PIANO STORE

79 Germain Street

In the Path of the Slide

By Wm. MacLeod Raine

 A sigh came tremulously from her, and he knew she would live. His awkward, numbered fingers undid the lacing of her high boots and slipped them from her feet so that they might get the fire warmth more directly. Then he pulled off her gauntlets and chafed her frozen little hands.
 Presently he noticed tears were running down her cheeks and that she was flinching with the pain of returning circulation. But she had courage, and she fought back the cries that came to her lips. For it was an hour of agony, how great none can testify without having endured it. His helplessness before her weakness, his inability to endure the force of hissing pain for her, torturing him miserably. He did his best, rubbing and chafing the frozen flesh back to life with gentle rocking and groined with the pain of it.
 Once she caught at his arm, her dark eyes appealing for justice. "Don't think me a baby, please. You don't know—it's pretty bad."
 "I know," he said honestly. "But it must get better soon."
 After the pain had passed she fell asleep in the chair before the fire, quite worn out with fatigue and agony. She slept brokenly, fighting over again the terrible pain which she was just recovering. Meanwhile, he watched her shyly as she slept, stealing every now and then a glance at the slumbering picture that tugged at his heartstrings. Beneath the long lashes were dark rings born of what she had endured, but the distracting charm of her had never been more in evidence. The slight disarray of her dark hair, the relaxation of pose that but emphasized her dainty grace, the exaggerated carnation of her slightly parted lips, brought out more surely the appeal of her picturesque beauty.
 One when he glanced at her, he was put to inward confusion by the discovery that the dark velvet eyes were looking at him gravely.
 "Oh, I didn't know—Are you feeling better?" he exclaimed.
 "Yes, thank you."
 "The pain—is it—?"
 "Quite gone," she assured him, and a flush swept her face. "I suppose it is because I am not used to pain that I'm such a coward about it."
 "You are not very brave," he told her.
 She laughed in self-mockery. "I'm ashamed of my father's daughter."
 And indeed she was, for she had always been rather proud of her ability to cope with an emergency.
 He offered a deprecating remark, with his rare apologetic smile, that she should not mind to make excuses for me. I'm very game—very game, I'm sure it's rather a commendation, you know."
 He could see she was taking it as a part of her punishment that he should know her self-contempt, and he could guess how she took this so completely to her heart.
 "What time is it?" she asked suddenly.
 "Three o'clock," he told her, after looking at his watch.
 "Three o'clock?" she announced.
 "Home! But you couldn't possibly reach it in this storm!"
 "Your father is at Red Cloud. The storm has not let him start home in the blizzard."
 "I don't think he will," she murmured, her eyes on the fire.
 His shyness ran over him like a flame. "I am afraid—I do very much regret that I have not yet had time to pack a decent dinner for you. The snow is so deep and from his dismay of the weather, it would not be a good idea to attempt it. I have a touch of humorous malice."
 He found nothing to say to that, but he succeeded in saying it with an eloquent embarrassment that amused her. Clearly it was an easy thing to say, but it was a thing that she had not heard him say before. She looked at him, and that sturdy figure had been given him. And with the heels of that thought came the realization that she had saved her life at the risk of his own, had fought the storm for her long after she had succumbed to its fury. He had endured in grim silence the pain of returning circulation while she was writhing under it and he was helping her. He was afraid of a girl. So much was plain. But in her heart she knew him to be very much a man.
 Yet womanlike, she must exert her power to tease him, must hide the swift outburst of her gratitude under levity.
 "It was very good of you to save my life, since we are enemies," he murmured, frowning with embarrassment.
 "It is quite courteous for my host to say that my life is nothing?" she mocked.
 "I—I didn't mean—you misunderstand me."
 "Oh!" she smiled pleasantly at him. "I'm glad I do. We can be enemies and still retain the courtesies of civilized warfare."
 She understood him to deny incoherently that he was her enemy.
 "Oh, yes, you are," she assured him cheerfully. "You are a very friendly enemy to be sure, or you wouldn't have plowed out through the storm and carried me in. You did carry me, didn't you?"
 He could only look his dumb reproach, his abashed apology for the lethargy which circumstances had forced him during her unconsciousness.
 "I wonder that you will still be talking, Signor Benedetti; nobody marks you," she laughed.
 How could he know that she mocked herself rather than him and that back of her mockery lay an emotion she dared not let herself dwell upon?
 Presently she picked up a magazine and began turning the leaves incur-

WILL ASK JURY TRIAL FOR THAW

Desires to Have the Question of His Sanity Determined in This Way
 HEARING SEPT. 21

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y., Sept. 3.—Although an application to remove Harry K. Thaw from the Dutchess county jail here to some other institution was denied today, yet it may have the effect of stopping the frequent trips to Flakill Landing in the proceedings before a referee which have been the source of so much annoyance to Sheriff Robert W. Chanler, while they have provided the prisoner with no little diversion.
 The application was made by Edward E. Perkins, counsel for Sheriff Chanler, before Supreme Court Justice Morschauer. It was based on the report of an inspection made by the secretary of the state prison commission and was supported by an affidavit by the sheriff that the jail is not a suitable place for the confinement of Thaw as an insane person. In reply Thaw's counsel argued that the report of the state prison inspector was without effect, inasmuch as Thaw had been committed by the supreme court.
 It was Justice Morschauer himself who last May committed Thaw to the Dutchess county jail temporarily pending the determination of the habeas corpus proceedings which had been instituted by Thaw to obtain his release from the Matteawan asylum. After a trial, Judge Morschauer adjudged Thaw insane and ordered him re-committed to Matteawan. Before the order could be carried out, however, Thaw's new way to achieve a new writ of habeas corpus and Judge Mills ordered him detained in the county jail here until the new writ should be heard. This hearing was adjourned to September 21 and Judge Mills is then to be asked to allow Thaw a jury trial on the question of his sanity.
 Judicial control restraining him from interfering with the order of Justice Mills of commitment was a reason cited by Judge Morschauer for declining to entertain Mr. Perkins' motion.

WOMAN AND CHILD HAVE CLOSE CALL

Horse Rears in Front of Them at Foot of Main Street

A woman and her child narrowly escaped being killed at the foot of Main street yesterday while attempting to catch a street car.
 They had been standing on the sidewalk waiting for some time and did not notice the approach of a horse and wagon. When the car reached where they were standing they attempted to cross the street and run directly in front of the horse. The animal reared on its hind legs and would have trampled on the couple had not a gentleman who noticed their plight caught hold of its head and forced it back. The youth who drove the animal was driving recklessly at the time and did not make any effort to prevent an accident from taking place.
