BETTING ON HORSE RACES.

Newspaper Writer Says Gambling Is Not Blood Disease.

He Says It Is Impossible to Enjoy a Race Unless One Has a Wager on It.

Hugh Keough, of New Orleans, formerly a Hamilton newspaper man, writes as follows in a Buffalo newspaper: "The strongest argument used by those who want to turn back the wave says that gambling is a blood disease that can't be cured, and that therefore the incurables should be allowed to finish their natural bent to the finish, but I can't stand or it," said Billy Shakel, who from twenty to fifteen years ago was one of the most aggressive, affluent, and picturesque proprietors of gaming in Chicago.

"I am not on the reform lay," he added, hurriedly, as if to take the sting out of what might otherwise be construed as a sneer. "I bigger the gamblers are the more readily does his system respond to the standard cures prescribed by the reformers.

"When I say gambling, I mean the kind that flourished around here in my day—faro, roulette, stud, and the like. Not the horse game. We did not consider that gambling in my time, at least it never appealed to me, except when the races were going on and there were several wealthy horsemen would drop in of an evening and hit it up to the limit."

"The light that was waged in New York against race track betting did not win this time, but you can get your cheques ready to pay off on it. It looks hard to wipe out the value of several million dollars' worth of property and stop an amusement that furnishes work and recreation for a vast army, but reformers don't care about that."

"I know enough about horse racing to know that racing can't live without a revenue from betting, no more than a theatre can live without the door receipts, and there can't be any betting unless it is conducted openly."

"Even those who don't bet can't have any fun going where there is no betting going on. The highly respectable citizens of the Washington Park Club were the first to desert when the betting ring was closed. They were cured of the speculation disease with one treatment, and they apparently were cured to stay cured."

Major Daingerfield is not a racing judge, and Earl Grey does not issue the invitations to the officials for Woodbine.
