gerous one."
"How so? It is poisonous?"
"To a deadly degree," said the chevalier, with a pleasant smile. "Your night-shade is an innocent plant by its side. The very perfume of it is sufficient to send a strong man into a swoon. A woman might suffer still more."

ous.
"I have read," said she, "of persons being poisoned by the perfume of a flower, but always imagined the incident a pure invention."

"A certain fact, my dear madam," said the chevalier, with a smile, "as you might find yourself, if the experiment were not so disagreeable."

Her ladyship laughed at this sally and the chevalier turned to another subject. But her ladyship's curiosity had been aroused and her love of the awful—which all women possess in a large or small degree—attracted by the subpect, and after a little while she returned to it by asking the chevalier if he had ever had one of the fatal blossoms in his hand.

He had quite forgotten it by that I am fond of chemistry and physiology; indeed, have studied with one of our best chemists and analysts for some Pest chemists and analysts for some years. It is strange how I came to take such a fancy," he added, apologetically, "but it had its origin in a romance. I dare say you could remember—ah, no, your ladyship must have been smothered in lace and linen at that time—but you may have heard of the celebrated poisoning case at Rome some twent fine. No, her ladyship had not heard of it.

No, her ladyship had not heard of it, and was curious to hear how it had inluenced the chevalier's studies.

'It was an affair of the heart—all murders spring from love or money. A woman, daughter of a count, had fallen in love with a young Roman officer, but, alas! without awakening the answering passion. Indeed, he was engaged to another lady, the dearest friend of the disappointed one. She was very infatuated, poor girl—your ladyship must forgive me for pitying her—but managed with infinite art to conceal it; in fact, assumed the most passionate friendship for her rival, and on the eve of her marriage with the young officer inaisted upfor her rival, and on the eve of her marriage with the young officer insisted upon attending her in the capacity of bridesmaid and bosom friend. On the morrow she would not let the waiting-maid attire the bride, but with her own hands arranged those fearful mysteries, the veil and orange blossoms, and reserved for the last moment the climax of her friendly devotion.

Embracing her, she whistowed.

Embracing her, she whispered:
"Rose, if you love me as I love you,

"Rose, it you love me as I love you, grant me one request."

"What is it? asked the bride.

"Nothing very hard,' said the ather.
Only this, dear Rose; I have brought you a flower, the choicest the world holds. See!' and she held up a water flower; 'is it not beautiful? No, do not touch it, let me fasten it to your boson." touch it, let me fasten it to your bosom There, that is lovely—the finishing touch! Now you are indeed perfect! But Rose, promise me that when the priest elevates the sacred elements, you will kiss my poor flower! Promise me, and I happy, knowing that you love

"The bride gave the promise and fulfilled it! She kissed the fatal flower and fell dead on the altar step."

As he finished the last words his voice, which had only been audible to his companion, dropped to a grave whisper, and her ladyship, looking up with a strange expression upon her face, recoiled at the depth of the dark eyes fixed on hers.
"There," he said, with a light laugh,

the rest.

When the gentlemen reached the drawing-room the vacant place was there, as her ladyship had promised, and the chevalier dropped into it.

But he seemed to have forgotten the price at which he obtained it, and it was not until his beautiful neighbor tapped his arm with her jeweled fan that he "Come," she said, "if you are going to sleep I will join Lord Harcourt at whist. Have you forgotten that you were to tell me of that terrible flower?"

"Ah, yes; a thousand pardons. I have acquired the bad habit of falling into a muse, what you English call a 'brown study.' The poison flower? Ah, yes. Well, your ladyship would like one. Now, I have a blossom, but—"
"But what?" asked her ladyship, with charming indifference.
"I scarcely dare give it to you." he

"It is most amusing. Come, your ladyship shall swear. See, here is a cross—a pretty, little sparkling toy; set it to your lips. Say, 'I swear that, happen what will. I will never disclose from whom I obtained the poison flower!" pen what will, I will never discusse from whom I obtained the poison flower!" Her ladyship, fully entering into the mock heroism of the scene, repeated, in a low voice, the dictated oath. "There, surely that is pledge enough, phenalicy?"

man might suffer still more."

"Indeed," said her ladyship. "How very dreadful!" Have you ever seen anyone suffer from its effects?"

"Often," said the chevalier. "It is well known in Venice among a certain class, and a number of murders have been effected by its agency."

"How delightfully mysterious," smiled "How delightfully mysterious," smiled ther ladyship. "There is the ring, and I shall expect my little present to-night." "To-night." he replied, quickly slipping the ring upon his fourth finger. "Let me warn you, the plant possesses ail the deadly powers of which I spoke. Let no one touch it or smell it. To taste it is death!" "I will be careful. I dare say I shall be so frightened of it that I shall burn it half an hour after it arrives," laughed her ladyship.

it half an hour after it arrives," laughed her ladyship.
"I dare say," he said. "Ten o'clock! I must beat a retreat."
With a courtly bow he left her.
The next morning her ladyship's num-erous admirers were surprised and puz-zled at seeing her emerald and ruby ring sparkling outside her dainty riding

Highly satisfied with this last link in his chain, the chevalier in another char-acter proceeded to book two berths in a vessel lying in the docks, preparing for a voyage to Italy. The berths were booked in the names of Dr. Ambrose and son, and the said Dr. Ambrose quite captivated the captain by the way in which he praised the order and completeness of the vessel, and the affability he displayed on drinking the captain's health in the state cabin.

"There," he said, with a light laugh, "is a romance for you, and a true one. Now, what do you say to my American lily?"

"That is very awful, and that I should like to have one. It would be delicious to know that one possessed so dreadful a thing."

"Yes, a tiger in the drawing-room or a rattlesmake in my lady's boudoir is nothing to it," said the chevalier, with a laugh. "But is your ladyship serious." Would you really like to have the flower?"

"Yes, really," said Lady Melville, smiling and toving with her white lace hardkerchief.

"Well—ah, the duchess has risen. Willy you save me a corner on the lounge?! will tell you something more of it."

Lady Melville nodded pleasantly, and joined the other ladies in their retreat, unconscious of the sardonic smile that set upon the lip of the chevalier as he watched her stately figure mingling with the rest.

What affection can I feel for this place, Melchior, when I remember that it has been to me—not home, but a prison?"

"And what but hate can you feel for the man who sits before you, when you are reminded daily that he is your jailer?" returned Melchior, but with a touch of remorseful sadness wondrously strange to him.

A slight curl of the lip answered him. "The chevalier would not have me think him so cowardly. No, I will not accept it. You are afraid to trust me," turning from him with a most charming pout.

"Pray, forgive me," returned the higher bred diplomat. "I was not in earnest. Your ladyship shall have the flower, but, any ou smile—you will promise me that no one shall know from whom you got it!"

"I promise. Nay!" she said, with an amused laugh. "If that is not earnest enough for you, chevalier, I will swear, as they do in Venice, never to disclose the name of the donor."

Ottawa, June 23.—In the Hull Police Court this morning several witnesses testified that Mrs. Lajoie, the Aylmer woman charged with cruel and inhuman treatment of her nine-year-old daughter, had habitually starved and cruelly beaten the unfortunate child. Medical evidence showed that she was covered with bruises, and in an extremely emaciated condition from lack of food, when taken from her home by the authorities. One neighbor told of her hearing the mother declare that she hated the child enough to poison her. Another told of seeing the inhuman mother beat her savagely with a heavy club, and declared that the child had been kept for hours on her knees as a punishmen for some fancied offence. Frequently the little girl was seen searching in the yard for potato peelings and scraps of meat with which to appease her hunger.

The child is still in the hospital and did not give evidence. The mother was committed for trial.

Leon Ling, and had known both the girl and har mother for years, is of the same belief. Mr. Ward is inclined to the theory of Quan Yick Nam, the interpreter, who thinks that the girl was lured to Leon's room by a report of his feighed illness and there chloroformed, after Leon had been angreed by her coldness, and her refusal to see no more of Chu Gain, his wealthier rival.

The chloroform, Quan believes, work eld too well, and when Leon Gound he could not revive Elsie, he bound her with a cord and wedged her into the trunk. In support of this theory is the pathetic and moving prayer written on a mission letter head which the girl left for her mother on the day she went to her death. It seems impossible, it is argued, that a girl going on any but a righteous mission could have written such a note.

HEALTH AND SUCCESS

By Keeping Vigor and Vitality at the Top Notch—DR. CHASELE TOP Notch—DR.

Captain Carey to-day paid another visit to the room where the body lay and found ashes in the stove, which may account for the missing skirt and waist and the missing handkerchief which Chung says he saw between the girl's teeth.

bred an actor and the knowledge that all Chinese actors are trained to take female parts did not, on second thought, greatly impress the police with the idea that he would so disguise himself. It is much more probable, the police believe, that their man either took ship as a sailor or cook, or has worked his way south into some of the obscure colonies on the outskirts of New Orleans, Baltimore or Galveston.

A report from Schenectady that a Chinese wearing a long quilted silk cloak, beneath which a woman's skirt could be seen at times, has not developed so far as the police here were concerned to-night.

Mr. Ward, assistant district attorney, and Captain Carey had been drilling away at Chung Sin for two hours, and Chung had tangled himself in contradictions. For an hour he had doubled like a fox, back and forth over his own trail, trying to explain his movements immediately after he ran away from the Eighth avenue chop-suey house. Ward was tired and Carey felt savage. They could not pin Chung down to admission he had been near the body.

He could not have watched Leung by looking through the transom because the connecting door has no transom. He could not have seen much by squinting through the keyhole—the only hole in the door—because a detective who placed an eye at the keyhole was able to command only a small part of the room. Chung could not have seen the girl's body from behind his own door because the cheap canopy over the bed would have blocked his view of Elsie even if he could have seen the bed itself through the keyhole.

and Leung told him she had bitten her tongue and had bled to death.

Leung wanted Chung to help lift the body off the bed and put it in the trunk, but Chung would not. He stood there, though, and watched Leung pull the trunk out of a closet, kick the lid open and throw out the clothing until the trunk was empty. Leung then asked Chung for money and Chung gave him $200 of the amount that he got from Chun Gain. When Chung saw the trunk standing empty and Leung ready to handle the body, he lost his nerve, he said, and ran a.d of the room.
