Now, if there's one thing I hate worse than another it's to be dictated to with regard to what I shall or shill not write, and dictation from my estimable friend the bright and shining Light of Tung Signal feels to me about an invigorating summer as the lasso of the festive control to the fiery, untamed mustang of the western plains; but the mustang generally hows to the inevitable, and moder the sir cumstances I won't be so foolinh as to stiffen my neck, and show thereby that I haven't as good instinct as a prairie mustang. So here goes to carry out your age," as the old woman said of the same and invigorating summer resort.

The early history of the town is an unknown quantity, so far as my parsonal knewledge is concerned, but I've lived here long enough to get the sacred and prefene history of pretty nearly every man Jack and woman Milit in the section. Some of the people of Goderich are particularly favorable to imparting information concerning their neighbors' affairs, and as a consequence it doesn't take quite a century to become throughly posted in local history. But the private plocadilloes of the neighbors aren't a health-giving elixir for invalids, and so I'll confine the care of the duky blood was there.

-June has some - bright, happy, joyons June-filled with the pleasant odors of grasses, leaves and flowers. To my mind June is the most pleasant month of the year, and for this, amongst other reasons: It is the the resting spell between seed time and harvest—least-ways, that's the way we used to look upon it when I was on the farm, and before the labor-saving apparatus of farming-made-easy came into fashion.

With the swift cances of birch, When our chief sped forth to battle, But I like June for another reason, and It is because in that month the town of Goderich, where I am now sojourning, looks better than in any other. In any month of the year Huron's county town holds place amongst the finest in the land, but in June it shows to even greater advantage that at other times of the year. In the "leafy month of June." the wide avenues and smooth streets of the town looks like pictures on canvas, and the broad drives, verdant fringes, fragrant flowers and shady foliage are exceedingly pleasant to the eye. No town in Canada, that I've seen-and I've rambled about quite a bit, you know-can boast of such uniformly wide streets and well set-out trees. When I sometimes get out on the front stoop, and chew the cud of reflection while gazing up street, I am often carried back to the long ago when I used to sit on the fence near the gate of the old loved homestead and gaze up the concession line, and think that the road led to the village, and the village to the city, and the city to fame and fortune, -and-but I generally stopped right there at the fame and fortune line, for somehow young folk rarely think of anything beyond getting rich. And, looking back, I really don't blame them, for although in my long and chequered career I have discovered that you can estimate no man's happiness by the size of his bank account, by the breadth of his acres, or the magnificence of the architecture of his stately business blocks, yet in my pilgrimage I've known a lot of grown Like the bitter frosts of winter people to try and buy joy as they would atore goods-and always without success. But there-if I haven't started philosophizing again, notwithstanding the instructions of the great Mogul of THE SIGNAL that I should confine myself to ordinary writing.

-I've been told that already the summer visitors are beginning to make entouse people, as to when their presence will be acceptable, and if that is the case now, what'll it be after the 15th inst., when bass and pickerel will be in season, and the rod and line and trolling-hook will be the order of the day. We've a grand lot of local disciples of Isaac Walton in town, and it's amusing when you get up so early in the morning that you awaken the roosters to crow, and when you think you have the bulge on the neighbors, you have the bulge on the neighbors, lif anyone speaks evil of you, let your by a large majority, so far as getting life be so that no one will believe him.

Of the purest vigin gold;
While the precious wampum girdle
Of her royal kinship told.
Oft the vision stands before me,
And I hear that voice again,
Sweet, the sadden'd, thro' the gloaming,
Like the voice of one in pain:

Ev'ry tree concealed a hunter, Ev'ry thicket held a deer ; And the rivers teem'd with fatness, Thro'each onward rolling year— Sweetly sang each forest songster To the chieftain's dusky bride, As she wander'd in the shadows With her lover by her side.

When the council fires were lighted. Words arose from ancient sachems From the mossy cushion'd ground Then the winds forgot to wh And the maples bending low, Drank the words of wisdom spoken, By the sage old man below.

Ev'rywhere was joy and gladness, And the Mighty Manito
Walk'd among his brave red children,
For their hearts were good and true; And the whispers of the Spirits As they wander'd tho' the trees Swestly blended with the music Of the sigking summer breeze.

'We were lords of take and river From the rising of the sun, To the broad and deep sea water, Where his wigwam floats alone But the pale face came among us, With his crooked oily tongue And his deadly firewater To destroy both old and young.

"So we faded like the forest In the moon of falling leaves, And where once our hunters tarried Are the pale faced brothers' sheaves We are strangers by the river, And the white man claims the mounds Where our braves await the summons To the happy hunting grounds.

'Soon my people will have vanish'd r songs be heard no more, And their light canoes lie rotten By the silent river shore-When the summer sun is come, Will the red man be forgotten In the land he knew as home."

It contains a fixed light, consisting of numerous lamps with silvered reflectors, and sheds its welcome rays far over the dark waters. To the right, lies the harbor in the deep hollow or recess which the united waters of the river and lake have eaten out of the land. A broad breakwater shields it from the wash of the lake, and the entrance is protected by two long piers of crib-work. Massive as these defences are, they cannot altogether resist the hydraulic force of the waves, when the storm aweeps from the wintry north. As, however, Goderich is one of the very few harbors on this exposed coast into which belated vessels can run for refuge, and is besides a principal ship-ping port for grain and lumber, the Dominion Government wisely keeps the Early in the morning the artist, President Bates, and some others, rose and took a spin about the place to inspect it. Goderich is the principal watering place of Western On-iario, and it well deserves its high reputation for beauty of location and sur-roundings. The town is built upon a bold headland overlooking the lake. There is a small bay, the entrance of a river, and another bold headland, called "The Cape," on its opposite side, which shows finely from the town. Upon the brow of the headland is a reserved parade-ground, with the light-house. Here the bluff is almost a precipice, and the view in very fine, embracing many miles of coast, the bay, and the steep side and end of the opposite cape. On this morning, the waves of Lake Huron were beating sullenly at the foot of the bluff; the sun had risen amid drifting clouds casting checkered lights and shadows over the water, which had a blue-grey hue, of a threatening character. All about the neighbor-hood, within a radius of half a dozen miles, are summer hotels and summer residences, on locations which command the choicest views and other attractions.

If ever a cause was treacherously be-trayed by those from whom better things were to have been expected it was the cause of Home Rule in the hands of Messrs. Costigan and Curran, They know that the leader of their party is a legislative unionist, that he is bitterly hostile to any measure of Home Rule, and that he did his best before to make the matter as little effective as possible.
