THE MISSING SOUIRE

Or, a Birthday Disappearance.

By Jabey Wraywright.

'Mrs. Brogden,' said Sir Arthur Dodson, entering hastily, 'I would recommend that you ladies retire for the night. You can do no good, and do but torture yourselves needlessly. So far we have failed to come up with your nephew, and we think now that, after parting with us, he was called away so suddenly that he had not time to notify us. He will probably return in the morning.'

Two at least among his listeners-Mrs. Brogden and Grace Claremont -showed very plainly that they put but little faith in his explanation.

'That can scarcely be,' said the older woman, dejectedly. 'The servants would have known.'

'Not necessarily,' he answered and once again, dear madam, permit me to beg that you retire. Everything that can be done will be done. His friends will not remain idle.'

"Come," said Mrs. Brogden, withou turning her head, "Sir Arthur is right-we can do no good; a wo man can but sit with folded hands and endure."

A few minutes later the room was deserted; the fire flickering on the hearth cast quaint shadows through the gloom; now and then a log crumbled and fell, scattering a shower of ashes, and lighting up for a moment the wreaths and garlands on the walls. "Welcome to Broad Oak" ran the legend over the doors. A while ago nothing seemed more appropriate, but now, while this mystery was unsolved, the young host's absence unaccounted for, the cheerful words seemed almost a mockery. The next morning dawned bright and clear. Already from the tiny village down the road came the sounds of life; but in spite of the bells that rang so gaily from the tower, and in spite of the laughing voices of children who knew no better, it was evident that some deep sorrow had through the evening when the door checked the careless words and stilled the laughter on the lips of the in their midst.

older people. All night long armed with lanterns and torches, the village men had now, just as the world was waking to a new day, they had returnedwith tired bodies and heavy heartsbringing no tidings.

Up at the Hall the same grim shadow reigned; it sat down with the breakfast-table, it followed them down kindly, were fixed and cold beneath the winding hallways, and through the stately rooms. It stood with Grace Claremont amidst the graceful luxuries of her chambers; it neered over her shoulder when she Slowly the sad day passed, and now it was once more night-the still soundless night of the country.

The late train from London had brought down a celebrated detective, and at sight of him who had unravelled so many mysteries, hope sprang anew in the breasts of all.

Mrs. Brogden left her room, and ordered that tea should be served in cheeks. the drawing-room at the usual hour.

Grace Claremont, whose shadowed eyes and weary air told a story that was not to be misunderstood, arrayed herself in one of the shimmering gowns that Sidney admired, and beneath a cold exterior sought to hide the grief that was only too apparent. The younger men hovered about the fire, wild with impatience to know

As he advanced further into th room, the spell that had at first bound the party was broken. Mrs. Brogden sprang forward with an inarticulate glanced listlessly at her colourless cry of joy; the young men crowded around, offering their congratulations. Grace Claremont alone made no sign. about him at the grave troubled faces and sympathetic eyes; "Nay, better not-no one save myself shall know the misery I endured. I called for help until my throat was parched; once I thought I heard footsteps, and I cried aloud—there was no response. This morning, after I had given up all hope of deliverance to my great joy I perceived stealing through a chink in my prison roof a faint, hardly noticeable ray of light It warned me that I was separated rom the outer world by only a few feet of brick and mortar. I hoped once more. Drawing my clasp-knife rom my pocket, I fell to work to renove the bricks and cut a passage for myself.

"It did not take me long to discover that the task I had begun was almost beyond my strength; the few feet of brick and mortar proved to be many-the masons had done their work well-my knife was dull and ed by an inexperienced hand. More than once I cast it aside in despairing hopelessness; more than once during the long struggle for freedom I told myself that I had gazed my last upon all that made life dear." He paused. then went on, but so hoarsely as to be almost inaudible. "At length the work was done, and through the ppening I had made I crawled forth into the open air.

"I came through the front door, and earing voices, guided my footsteps hither. I fear I am but an ill-looking object." He glanced at his bruised hands and disordered garments. "You
