

"The Least Exertion Tired Me," Writes Mr. Benoit

Lack of the proper constituents in the blood is the cause of anemia. This may result from disease or run-down condition of the system. The symptoms are, pallor of the skin and mucous membrane, palpitation, weakness, languor, etc. Anemia is sometimes the forerunner of consumption. Everything should be done to build and tone up the system. Carnol relieved Mr. Benoit of anemia. He says:

"I had been feeling weak and depressed. The least exertion tired me. I had no appetite. If I got a few hours sleep at night I was lucky. I wanted to rest all the time. My nerves were on edge. The slightest thing irritated me. In fact, I was suffering from anemia. Finally I decided I would see my friend, Mr. H. H. Page, the druggist, and see if he could do something for me. He recommended me to take a Course of Carnol (six bottles). After I had taken the fourth bottle I was a different man. I could eat, sleep and do a heavy day's work without feeling tired. I also bought some bottles of Carnol for my mother-in-law and she was greatly benefited. Carnol is sold by all good druggists everywhere."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Miss Adeline Cleveland.
Madam:—Fortunately for me, and perhaps also for yourself, I returned to look for your maid, immediately after our painful interview, and most indorse the opinion of the appreciative Jean. The acting on your part was superb. I had been completely deceived by it, and congratulate you upon your versatile powers. Needless to say, I shall not write to Arundel House any more, and henceforth, if we meet again, it must be as strangers. The money I owe to you will be repaid as soon as I can possibly raise the necessary amount. Your faithfully,
NOEL CAMPBELL.

Miss Cleveland read this through, then indulged in a paroxysm of rage. "Fool! Fool! I have lost him, and by my own stupidity! Recall is now impossible. All is at an end, except—vengeance!"

Her eyes blazed, and the last word came through her clinched teeth like the hiss of a snake!

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Arrived at his club, Noel Campbell wrote the letter to Miss Cleveland which appears in the concluding portion of the foregoing chapter. Having posted it with his own hands, he dined at a restaurant, and afterward walked to Ludgate Hill station, whence he took a train to Dulwich.
"To think," he said to himself, "that I was very nearly making that woman my wife! And, yet, it is quite possible that she would have made me a good wife in the eyes of the world. A handsome woman, an affable and model hostess—a woman who would have prized me as a valuable possession, but whose nature is as cold as ice. A clever woman, who can act many parts, but worldly, diplomatic, and unamiable!"

On the whole, he considered that he had had a very remarkable escape, and congratulated himself upon it.

When he had turned away from Miss Cleveland's boudoir, with her last dramatic words ringing through his very soul, "Dear God, let me die!" he felt wretched and bewildered. He felt that he was a pitiful rascal, and believed that her love for him was deep and sincere. He went away, but came back again, and was of course amazed by what he saw and heard. Though his vanity was wounded, he could have shouted for joy! He shook the dust of Arundel House from his feet forever! He was free—free as air!

He left the drama at Dulwich, and walked sharply until he came to the Barry road.

It was now quite dark, and after assuring himself that he was not being followed, he entered one of the fore courts that face most of the houses in that would-be respectable locality. He rang a bell, which was responded to by a middle-aged woman, and was promptly admitted.

"Is Mr. Markham in?" he asked.

"Yes, sir," replied the woman, who was the housekeeper.

"Then tell him that I desire to see him. I am Mr. Ernscliffe; you remember me, do you not?"

"Certainly, sir. You are the gentleman who rented the house furnished from Mr. Maraden, my master; that is, who has gone on a business trip to America, and you paid two months' rent in advance."

The idea of forgetting the identity of a man who had paid two months' rent in advance seemed an impossibility to the housekeeper.

Noel was shown into a plainly-furnished sitting-room, and the woman went in quest of the person called Mr. Markham.

In a very few minutes a modest tap was heard at the door, followed by an apologetic little cough, and Sir John Sterne's valet, fidus Achates entered.

"Good-evening, Mr. Ernscliffe," he said. "I see that you received my telegram, and I am very glad that you have come."

"How is your master, Markham?"

"Sensible, sir, quite sensible, and it is that which frightens me, though he is too weak yet to remember anything. He knows me, and that is about all; but he asked for Miss Clara this afternoon, and I'm in terror for fear he should let something out before the doctor and that meddling old woman. Of course, when he gets his natural self anybody will be able to see with half an eye that he isn't my brother. Any news, sir? Ah! I wouldn't have that villain of a nephew of his find out that he was in England for words. What we should have done but for you, sir, I really don't know, when that fit took him within an hour of the time we were due to board the City of Richmond. And how you came to be in Liverpool is a wonder to me."

"Markham," Noel said, gravely, "I heard from Miss Sterne that her father was going abroad upon a wild-goose chase, and I kept a watch upon him, and followed you to Liverpool."

"Yes, sir, on behalf of that scoundrel of a nephew of his, but you soon saw which was the villain, eh?"

"Yes, Markham, I did. And now, I have a little surprise for you," Noel went on, "but I will preface this by a piece of good news; I can prove that Sir John is innocent of the crime of murder. I have an assurance of Castlemon in writing. He is in England. I am not sure how Captain Campbell died; it may have been in a duel with Sir John, but in a few days I am promised a full and complete history which will entirely exculpate your master."

"Oh, Mr. Ernscliffe, God will reward you for this!" cried Markham, quite forgetting his dignity, and seizing Campbell's hand, he kissed it warmly.

"Everything is for the best, after all, and when Sir John was stricken, and I saw you, I gave all up for lost."

"Now for my little surprise," Noel went on, still in the same grave tone. "Markham, my deception has gone on quite long enough. I am Noel Campbell!"

"No, sir! Oh, don't! No larks, please!" cried the valet.

"What I say is simple truth. Ernscliffe is a professional name I adopted some years since. I am Noel Campbell, and I have very properly been punished for permitting an unscrupulous lawyer and others to act in my name. I was so bound up in the business of my profession, that I did not care to be troubled, even to be consulted. I gave my lawyer carte blanche, and knew positively nothing of what was going on until it was announced by my mother that I should soon be master of Blairwood. I then emerged from my shell and began to think. I heard much that appalled me, but unknown to any one, and still believing that Sir John was a few degrees blacker than the King of Inferno, I determined to see him and help him out of the hands of his persecutors."

"But your letters, sir—your awfully cruel letters!" Markham said.

"I never wrote them," Noel told him, sternly. "They were forged. You will learn all very soon, Markham. My great desire is to restore Sir John to perfect health—to prove to him that we have both been the playthings of several schemers, who will soon be buried in the ruins of their own—"

"Mr. Markham!" interrupted the housekeeper, "here's your brother out of bed, and coming downstairs!"

The valet ran to the door, and was astounded to see his master carefully guiding himself along the banister rail. He was partially dressed, and his face was livid with fear.

"What does this mean?" he demanded, huskily.

"I have been betrayed! Markham, explain this. Infernal jugglery, I thought that we were aboard the City of Richmond, and see that we are somewhere in the neighborhood of London. I can tell by the very odor of the air!"

Both Campbell and Markham hurried to his assistance, for he had passed half-way down the stairs, and was only keeping his feet by the greatest difficulty.

Bullet Wound in Temple

Man is Found at Foot of Cross in St. Paul's Dome.

London, Nov. 23.—(Associated Press).—Surviving from a bullet wound in the temple a man was found yesterday lying in the Golden Gallery which runs around the dome below the cross. The man was still alive when discovered. The police cleared the public from the upper part of the edifice and rushed the man to a hospital where it is stated he will probably die.

A revolver from which one shot had been fired, was found in his possession, but his identity has not been established and nothing is known of the circumstances of the tragedy enacted at the foot of the cross on one of the world's most famous sacred edifices.

(Later)—The man found yesterday at the foot of the cross in St. Paul's dome with a bullet wound in his head, later identified as J. Tysoe-Smith, of Manchester, died in hospital. It is believed that business worries had caused the man to take his own life.

GIVING ADVICE.

I've lived next door to B. H. Barr since 'Lisa crossed the sea and our affection naught could mar—a thing beyond all price; and when he planned to buy a car he asked for my advice. "The Roorback car is what you need," I said, and meant it all; "it has the pep, it has the speed, its upkeep cost is small; since you have asked me for my advice, the Roorback has the call." He bought a Roorback car that day, nor grumbled at the cost; and now he stops me on my way to tell me I'm a frost; it is no good, that blamed old dray, from bumper to exhaust. It is a pitfall and a snare, it has no pep or kick, the way it wallows everywhere just makes his aprit sick; some day, he says, he will get square, and pay me for that trick. We have no pleasant visits now, when dusk is all around, but gloom is throned upon his brow, his laughs do not resound, and often I can hear him cuss in lingo five or three, and as he talks amid the muck his wrath is sad to see. Oh, never more shall I advise the man who'd buy a boat; let other self-complacent guys themselves to that devote, let other neighbors put him wise and sound the helpful note.

Canned Salmon Preference

After a long period of darkness a ray of light sheds itself upon the British Columbia salmon canning industry. For the last few years competition from the Japanese and Alaskan packs in the British market has proved an almost overwhelming handicap due to cheaper production and, which must not be minimized, methods of co-operative marketing adopted by our competitors as against expensive individual marketing on our part. The New Economic policy being framed by Premier Baldwin of Great Britain, promises to give protection to Empire products which do not come into serious competition with domestic production. It happens that canned salmon falls in such a category. The Old Country is not a producer, but it is a big consumer. On the other hand, Canada is a big producer and the retention of the British market is rendered difficult by foreigners. It is stated in the press that London proposes to raise a tariff of ten shillings a hundred pounds against canned salmon produced within the Empire, which means that Canadian producers would have a straight handicap of $2.50 a case, normal exchange, to overcome certain other advantages of competitors. Of course there is a big question involved in revolutionizing Great Britain's fiscal policy, but for the sake of Empire cohesion and to make the great commonwealth of nations sufficient within itself it is to be hoped that the principle of according preference in the British markets to the products of the Dominions will be sustained.

The salmon canners have very wisely selected to exhibit at the British Empire Exhibition and they should be advised to tackle the job with the utmost earnestness. They should avail themselves of every means to recognize the market and derive home the advantage which tariff preference will afford. They have been seeking legislation in the Parliament of Great Britain to require marking on all tinned salmon, so that British consumers may be given an opportunity to choose between Empire and foreign goods. While that may be yet desirable it would seem that the appeal of lower cost would be much more in-pressive. A certain proportion of the Canadian salmon quoted lower than the population may trouble itself to choose is inevitable.

While speaking of the British market for canned salmon it is proposed to remark upon the opportunity of other lines of fish. Judging by reports from the Old Country there is need of imported fish. The North Sea is not yielding its remarkable volume and the nation's appetite has been whetted for fish. The British Empire Exhibition, from April to October, 1924, offers an excellent opportunity to introduce our commodities and houses interested in the development of foreign business would do well to investigate the matter.
