The preacher smiled with an open-heartedness he had not shown before.

"You are bespoke, I guess. Are you worthy of her, young man?" he asked Hugh seriously.

"I don't know—nobody could be!"

"When are you going to marry?"
Hugh made a clean breast of it.
"We are on our way to Vincennes; we want to be married as soon as we can."
"You are running away from your paramete?" "When are you going to marry?"
Hugh made a clean breast of it.
"We are on our way to Vincennes; we want to be married as soon as we can."
"You are running away from your parents?"
"We have no parents; we are Rappites from the community at Harmonie. We have been brought up to think marriage wrong, but we couldn't help loving each other."
The preacher chuckled with a quiet enterty of the state of the wife and the family than a thousand passions, though they deck themselves with all the glories of sentiment.
"I have been careless and selfish, Trillis; I will be good to you." He kissed her hand reverently, and she looked up and smiled her supreme content.
The preacher was pacing the aisles. His hands were clasped behind him, his hat was pushed to the back of his large had, and his feet came down with a

"Oh, but she is! She weighs two hundred pounds!"

"And can cook like this? Who is she? She does not live in my circuit."

"She is not far out of it," said Trillis, with a desire to tease a little in return. "But she is no Methodist."

"Is she married? I'm a bachelor myself and in the market."

She looked at him appraisingly.
"I think you are too large. I am sorry, sir."

Trillis arose and stood beside Hugh. The wind moaned round the log church, the rain dashed fiercely at the windows, but the great fire burned steaduy and glorified the rude interior and spread a sort of cheer over the empty benches. The storm and the night typified the fears and sorrows of life; the fire, that warm and vital force which makes a safe and sweet retreat within the radius of its influence for any who will feed its flame.

of its influence for any who will feed its flame.

When the itinerant had pronounced the When the itinerant had pronounced the solemn and simple ceremony and the two were man and wife, they sat down and kept a long silence; then Trillis' hand stole along the bench. At its touch Hugh's closed over it, and, in that instant, his love underwent transmutation. From a mere boy's passion, that any woman might have plucked and worn, it became a strong sense of duty, a defence, a service. It was the budding of that feeling which is of more value to the wife and the family than a thousand passions,

The preacher chuckled with a quiet enjoyment, his manner warming toward them.

"Well, I'm glad you had the spunk to defy that old cold-blooded Rapp!"

"But you do not know him!" cried Trillis, with generous defence of the friend they were on the eve of deserting.

"He is most kind! He does not know we care for each other like this. We love him."

"Why did not you tell him and remain quietly at Harmonie and be married?" the preacher asked cooly: then quietly.

we care for each other like this. We love him."

"Why did not you tell him and remain quietly at Harmonie and be married?" the preacher asked cooly; then quietly answered himself. "Of course you dared not let him know. Oh, I know what an old tyrant he is! He must kind o' charm you folks like a snake. They say you folks like a snake of the snarry you myself, just to spite him!"

Hugh and Trillis exchanged glances. Hugh and Trillis exchanged glances. Hugh had chosen the bench behind her, and himself you had taught her something of conventionalities. She saw more clearly than before the advantage of marriage. Hugh had chosen the bench behind her, and how and then leaned over to look at her, filling her heart each time with a rush of feeling that made her forget ner weariness. He loved her, and she was his wife; she would fall asleep always, hereafter, near him, and wake to find her happy face and her eager face.

"Would you marry us?" he asked, his you cet tembling a littue with the imminence of responsibilities that suddenly loomed great upon his mind.

"Yes, I could. You could get your license after; it is sometimes done in new countries. But I wonder if you

At midnight the storm abated, and the preacher bade Hugh farewell, with some strong and manly words of admention and encouragement. Trillis, had she been awake to hear, would have treasured mementoes of this holy hour; but Hugh's own thoughts were sounding such deep and reverberant notes that he scarcely heard the man, although he followed him to the door, and waited there, from the habit of courtesy, until he rode away in the darkness.
