SOCIALISTS AS MIRACLE-MAKERS.

St. Januarius was a Christian of the early centuries, martyred in Naples, which made him, later on, its Patron Saint. Some of his blood, preserved in a phial, usually liquefies twice a year. There being no natural explanation for this phenomenon recurring regularly under the eyes of thousands, it evidently should be called a miracle. Some time ago, as we read in the Rome, the new English publication of the Eternal City, the Roman Socialists undertook to repeat the miracle. On the appointed day a phial containing some coagulated matter, said to be blood, was placed between four lighted candles, and the onlookers were told that the thing would liquefy in a few minutes. The trick refused to work, until the manipulator, warming the phial over a candle, shook it violently. The miracle-workers, challenged to perform the experiment under scientific examination, accepted at first, but after several delays, declared their inability to make good their pretensions. The result of this attempt
