JUST AN UNKNOWN HUSBAND OF A WELL KNOWN WOMAN

There is a Mr. Donald McLean, the impression to the contrary notwithstanding.
He's a lawyer in New York. Just now he and Em-Mrs. McLean's first name is Emily, you know—are shaking the mottos out of their summer clothes, preparatory to a long stay at the sea shore. They can go now that Mrs. McLean is no longer linked with the irksome president-generality of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

McLean has been a lawyer since 1872, when he graduated from Columbia College Law School, in New York.
He was well known until he was swallowed up, in 1882, in the oblivion of his life role as "Mrs. Donald McLean's husband." Two years before he was an alderman. He emerged once afterward. He was general appraiser of the port of New York from 1889 to 1893.

He follows the news from troublous South American republics with some interest. He has big gold mine holdings down there.

Mrs. McLean has no monopoly on the patriotic side of the law. Her husband belongs to half a dozen himself. Nevertheless friends of the Mc-Leans say that she is the most persistent liner.

The McLeans have lived in several houses since Emily Nelson Riney became Mrs. Donald McLean in Frederick, Md., but society only can recall her as mistress of the beautiful mansion at 186 Lenox-av., in the heart of the fashionable district.

P. S. McLean's office is at 27 William street, across the street from William Randolph Hearst's headquarters, at 38 William street. Hearst and she very often visit in one or the other office and discuss Dist. Atty.
Jerome.

The Best Of All

By EDITH BARNARD

Her Christmas presents to her were always conspicuous by their absence, and I suppose it was because she knew people not to let that be the case. I remembered that she had never given me a thing, and I was sure she knew her to do. Some one blundering fool asked her one Christmas which was her son's present, and the next day she sent me some one else for it. When I went to see her that afternoon—The Bishop paused again; not a man in the smoking-room was looking at him; in the pause the thin man lit his long cigar, very carefully.

"When you see her take up a package from the table—in those days she had come to the place where she could not move from the table—she showed me an address-label pasted on the wrapper; it was in Charlie's handwriting. Then she took out a valentine, a very pretty, large valentine, and smiled at me with a puzzling look in her eyes. I exclaimed, and said how fine the valentine was, and that Charlie must have taken the trouble to find out just when to post it, in order to get it here in time. She smiled, and said, 'I cannot see anything else of him, because I have what I want most of all.' She put her dear, old, withered hand on the cheek of the girl who was talking to her, and went on,
'When I was young, I used to pray to God for one thing, I said that if I would give me a living child, I should never ask for anything else. You see, I have what I most want; I have my dear boy, my Charlie. Don't you suppose he is worth whatever I suffer?'
The Bishop waited a minute or two,
a blessing, 'That is one kind of good woman, my friends.'

No one answered at first; then the man in the striped shirt cleared his throat and said, 'Well, I reckon a mother's the best of all.'

The youngest one said, with a slightly swaggering lift of his shoulders and a little break in his voice, 'Well, I know I'm going to send five dollars of my salary home every week. I made it up my mind to that before I came away.'

Hours later the train stopped to allow the passengers the privilege of breakfasting. Five of the men in the smoking compartment swung off the car and went to perch before the long counter and the young girl presently followed. There were many days when she heard watched them disappear through the dining station; then his gaze returned to the over-decorated interior of the little room, but he was not aware of its details. Instead he beheld a vision of a shady village street, a little boy in checked trousers running homeward from school, a bright little picture-card clasped in his hand—his first prize. He saw the child, the child he used to be, waving the card toward a window, and his mother's face smiling there. He heard her exclamation of pleasure—her boy was to go on, on through all the world, winning life's prizes, bringing them home to his mother. Did he not see how pleasant it was to do right and to win prizes?

He threw back his head, and with an exclamation which hurt him, rose unsteadily and went into the sleeping part of the car. Was it, though, a dusty sleeping-car, with its tumbled berths, or was it the long road of the future that stretched away before him on the day he left the little village, the road that promised to be so broad and smooth, and to lead to the end of the rainbow?

He remembered now; he remembered the little things she said him, he remembered the answer he wrote to the doctor, he remembered the first shame in asking her for more money, and he even remembered his late annoyance when he had to borrow—crayons, for enough to send her as her quarterly "interest."

But why, he began to ask himself, why had he gone so hard with him?
Why had he not succeeded, why had he failed, not only in his own life, but in everything else, except his mother's love? Why had he come to deserve—for he felt, dimly enough at first, but with a final realization that made his knees tremble, that he did deserve them—the things the men had called him, few hours ago in the smoking-room?

He shuffled down the aisle towards the berth where his wife was, but before he reached it self-pity had overcome him, and he threw himself into another berth, and began to cry. He lay face down and wept, not as a man does under a mighty grief, with sobs that rack and strain; he cried with stifles and little whimpering noises, like a child who is sorry for itself. It was not through his own fault that he had failed; the world had gone hard with him, that was all. His mother always understood him.

His wife was starting for the dressing room, her hair frizzy and looking very streaked in its disarray, a bundle of clothes over her arm. The door from the next berth attracted her attention, and she pulled the curtains aside and looked down upon her husband. He was still crying, and his sobs rather increased when he became aware of her presence.

"What's the matter?" she asked.
The man did not reply. His wife touched him, leaning over and shaking him a little. "What's the matter?" she repeated.

She stood up and looked puzzled for an instant, then frightened. "Say, I didn't let that crowd clean you out, did you?" she demanded sharply. Then she remembered that she carried a valet in a pocket under her skirt. She smiled grimly, in derision partly at his unbecoming form, and partly at her own unnecessary panic.

"Gee!" she said, "you must 'a' got loaded last night. Didn't know there was that much on board! Why didn't you pass it around?" Her tone was quite familiar now.

"She's dead," came up from the whispering man in the berth. The wife, puzzled, bent over to make sure of the fact. "What's right, 'What say?" she asked, patiently.

"She's dead," she said, "repeated" the man, with a smiling, white face.
The wife stood up, drew her kimono closer with a grimy, rigid hand, and started again for the dressing room.

"Lord," she said, "I guess it's up to me to get a move on and bring him in some coffee."

The man in the berth seemed to hear the words spoken earlier in the smoking room. "Some of them are so good that the bad ones don't make any difference in the average?" "Funny how good some women can be!"

"At the very last, when we no one could do anything but watch, I heard some one say to her one day:

"Oh, Aunt Electa! I don't see how you can be so cheerful and happy! I suffered as you do, I am sure I should ask God to release me, dear Aunt Electa, I cannot see anything else of God, because I have what I want most
was talking to her, and went on,
'When I was young, I used to pray to
I have what I most want; I have my
The Bishop waited a minute or two,

know I'm going to send five dollars of
away.'

the dining station; then his gaze re-
window, and his mother's face smiling
it was to do right and to win prizes?

ing part of the car. Was it, though,
on the day he left the little village,
the rainbow?

AMUSEMENTS.

WHY THE "STAR" GETS THE CROWD

There's really no wonder to the success of the Star Theatre in North End when the quality of the entertainment and the quantity of it are taken into consideration. For instance tonight and tomorrow the leading picture feature is to be The Road Agent, a beautifully scenic story of the days in the western states when bold highway-men were a terror to the people, a faithful reproduction of a historical fact without any gruesome features.
There will be four other films, comedies, dramas and educational travel views. Frank Austin, who is the hit of the hour, will conclude his vacation time and where the late Gladstone was wont to spend weeks each year.
This is a truly delightful scene. Another distinctly novel feature will be The Gold Prospector, a western drama with a truly delightful scene. An-

KING EDWARD'S RESORT AT NICKEL

Another magnificent series of ragging sea photographs will greet Nickel patrons today and tomorrow in Bold Sisay Breakers, or the surf and bil-lows at Biarritz in France, where King Edward spends so much of his vacation time and where the late Gladstone

CONFIDENCE.

The above is the title of the feature picture at the Princess today. It is a golden romance of a girl from the golden west. Too much can not be said about the good vaudeville acts at the Princess today. Emil Charvillat, a solo and violinist, was a tremendous hit. His is a great novelty act.
The marvelous Tenny, comedy juggler, was encored repeatedly; he has the best juggling
