As was the custom when approaching a watering tank, the engine was uncoupled from the train and allowed to speed on to the water tank while the train followed and ran into a witch. On the train on which Mr. Diment met his death, the engineer had only been recently promoted from fireman. When the coupling pin had been pulled the engineer, without waiting for the customary signal from the brakeman, pulled out and Mr. Diment was thrown to the ground between the rails. He caught the brakebeam and was dragged along several car lengths when the train turned into a siding. In turning his body was thrown under the wheels, death being instantaneous. Frozen Ergs.

In the winter season quantities of eggs are frozen, and it is generally considered that such eggs are worth but little, or, to say the least, are much injured for cooking purposes. This, however, is not strictly true, for if properly treated they are but little injured. Instead of (as was the custom) putting them into cold water to take out the frost and waiting several hours for the thawing to take place, and then finding the yolks in such a solid state that they can be used with no satisfaction in cooking, try the following method: Place them in boiling water and leave them there for from five to twenty minutes, according to the amount of frost in them, when, upon being opened, the yolks will be found soft and in such a state that they can be used for almost any culinary purpose.
