Below the Water Line.

The Impact Tears a Gaping Hole in the Hull Through Which a Team of Horses Could Be Driven-The Awful Going Down of the Victims.

A feature of naval construction and warfare which attracted the attention of experts years ago and for a time was exceedingly popular is the ram. The idea of putting a short, stout spur out on the stem of a vessel, at or below the water line, to be thrust into an enemy's ship, had occurred to designers of war vessels as early as 1859. In that year there was added to the British navy the Warrier so equipped and to the French navy the Magenta similarly armed. But the final actual test of the ram, on which its future largely depended, occurred in 1862.

The Confederate ironclad Merrimac bore on her stem a spur which was used upon the Cumberland with such deadly effect that the latter vessel sank in a few minutes. Four years later, off the island of Lissa, another instructive engagement was fought. Admiral Tegetthoff, the Austrian commander, had a smaller fleet than the Italians under Persano, but he won a decisive victory. The chief mode of attack was with the ram, and two of the enemy's best ships, including the Re d'Italia, which had been the flagship of Persano up to the beginning of the fight, were sunk.

A third contribution to the world's knowledge of the possibilities of the ram was made in 1877 by the Peruvians. Their Huascar stove a terrible hole in the Chilean Esmeralda off Iquique. In consequence of this injury the Esmeralda, although she had fought with amazing pluck, quickly went to the bottom.

Two much more recent illustrations of the destruction which this weapon is capable of working are cited by William Ledyard Cathcart in Cassier's Magazine. The first of these was the tragic loss of the British battleship Victoria in time of peace. Admiral Tryon was putting the ships of his command, the Mediterranean squadron, through an unusual maneuver. The order given involved either a slip of the tongue or an error of calculation, but it was implicitly obeyed, and within a few minutes the admiral saw the huge Camperdown swung around so that she could not avoid striking the flagship. The Victoria kept afloat for ten minutes, but when she sank she took down 321 officers and men, including the unhappy Tryon. This event occurred in June, 1893.

Less lamentable in degree, but not less significant in character, was the disaster that overtook the German warship Grosser Kurfurst, in 1878, while proceeding westward along the southern coast of England. Accompanying this vessel and a little farther offshore was the Konig Wilhelm, an armor belted frigate of 9,600 tons displacement. A small merchant vessel putting to sea crossed the bows of the Germans and compelled them to turn their heads temporarily inshore. The Kurfurst resumed her former course before the Konig Wilhelm did, and before the navigators of either vessel realized the danger the Wil-helm had run her ram into her consort's side. The Kurfurst carried 6 officers and 81 men down with her.

Soon after the battle of Lissa the British admiralty began to develop a class of vessels which were intended to fight principally with their rams. The Rupert and the Hotspur were low ironclads of 3,200 and 4,000 tons and carrying one or two guns in a turret well forward. Then came the Hero and the Conqueror, which were bigger and more heavily armed. These latter carried 12 inch guns and displaced about 6,000 tons. The Polyphemus 1881) was more exclusively a ram, for her battery was a light one.

The next set of rams, built between 1886 and 1896, and including the Furious, Vindictive, Arrogant and Gladiator, were ships of 5,700 tons displacement and had light armor and protected decks. Their largest guns are of the 6 inch rapid fire type. The projection from the stem is massive, the bow is strongly braced and the armor belt is wider out forward than elsewhere. In order to facilitate rapid maneuvering there are two rudders, one just forward of the screw and the other aft. The dead wood at the stern is cut away so as to favor quick turning.

These and other war vessels of the same general type, not only in the British navy, but also in the fleets of other nations, have been called "ram cruisers" to distinguish them from other cruisers. The light construction of the ordinary cruiser, whose function is to hunt for the enemy rather than to fight him, which is built for speed rather than to withstand attack, precludes such collisions as a ram must encounter. Consequently those ships which are meant to fight with spurs on their stems are of the craft in the jurisdiction, that much more strongly built, especially about the bows. The idea of giving a vessel a prow that will rip open a hostile ship below the water line has been applied to the heaviest battleships. The Camperdown displaces about 10,000 tons and is about as heavy as the Oregon and Massachusetts of the American navy. The French battleship Brennus, which has a spurred stem, displaces 11,395 tons, while the Italia, also equipped with a ram, is a vessel of nearly 14.000 tons.

The formidable character of the kind of warfare here described will be better realized if one will remember that the biggest guns now used in the navy deliver projectiles only 13 inches in diameter, whereas a ram will cut a hole big enough to admit a two horse team. Tegetthoff himself was so shocked by his achievement in the battle of Lissa that he afterward said:

"If I were to live a thousand years, I would never ram another ship. The effect produced is different from anything else you have in naval warfare. You see the vessel attacked at one moment and the next 800 men sliding into the sea, with the vessel following them. You are left with a perfect void, without any commotion, without any smoke, without anything to make one feel that he was in battle."

Score One For Father.

A gentleman once said to a barrister, "That was a very good sermon of your father's today," to which he replied, "Yes; he must have cribbed it from some one.' But the father overheard this remark and reminded him that the Bible says, "The ox knoweth his owner and the ass his master's crib." This caustic reply silenced the barrister.—London Telegraph.
