THE BRITISH NAVY.

In the House of Commons, on the introduction of the naval vote, Mr. G. J. Goschen, first lord of the admiralty, made a general statement. He declared that it was due to the delays of contractors that the admiralty had not produced more ships. He defended the Belleville boilers, which had been unhesitatingly adopted by America, Germany, Japan and France, but ultimately he agreed to the appointment of a commission of practical engineers to examine the whole question. Mr. Goschen referred with satisfaction to the new turbine principle of propulsion. With regard to non-inflam-mable wood fittings, Mr. Goschen said the recent experiments with the old turret ship Belle Isle showed that the present arrangements of flooding decks with water were most successful. The admiralty had, he added, no evidence that Spanish warships possessed such elaborate precautions as were provided on board the Belle Isle. Non-inflammable wood is being used on some new warships, though it was not quite satisfactory in some of its other properties. Regarding the new battleships, Mr. Goschen said they would be of the Formidable class.
