arguments of the "Political Justice" retailed openly at the head of his table before cabinet ministers; and those of the "Natural History of Religion" before Bishops. He made the grave mistake of fancying that she might make a final display of her strange form of romance by perhaps running off with some democratic adventurer, just to prove her belief in the doctrine of universal equality—that she might do worse than marry a penniless ensign, even if she cared to go through the ceremony of marriage at all. Of course, in fancying any such thing he only showed how With her earlier life, as has already appeared, her Denethorp subjects were not very familiar. Her mother had died soon after her birth, and she had been almost constantly in London with her father, and scarcely ever at her country home, for which, being a man of pleasure and politics, he had no taste. It was generally supposed that she had refused countless offers of marriage from countless suitors, who were attracted by her wealth or beauty, or both; and it was known that at about the age of four-and-twenty she had gone abroad with her aunt, a Mrs. Lester, whose husband was something in the diplomatte pervice. After some years she returned With her earlier life, as has already with her aunt, a Mrs. Lester, whose husband was something in the diplomatte gervice. After some years she returned home again, and then both her father and herself took up their residence at Larl's Dene, where, very soon afterwards, Mr. Clare died. She was his only child and sole heir; and by the time that she came to the property, all her vague reputation for "oddness" had entirely passed away. She was a great lady, and she evidently intended to play out her role of great lady to the fullest extent. So successfully did she carry out her intention that she very soon became regarded with an aimost awiul reverence by all within reach of her influence, and with rebellious dislike by those with whom she, as a staunch Tory and High Church woman, had long declared open war—that is to say, by the reformers of the cloth mills and the growing body of Dissenters. To those who acknowledged her authority, she was generous and even kind; but to those who did not she was certainly not kind, and could be very often ungenerous. She was, in fact, endowed with no little of that political asperity which has been said by a great politician to be as unbecoming to a woman as a beard. Her views about church and state were both decided and practical, and, like the lady in Moliere, what she wished she wished furiously. what she wished she wished hers would hase desperately astonished those persons who remembered her youth, not in Denethorp, but in London, where it had been principally passed. These, too, had considered her odd, and with reason.

Nature had given her, besides her beautiful person, a precocious intelligence, an energetic mind, strong passible imagination, and gence, an energetic mind, strong passions, a most excitable imagination, and an amount of obstinacy that, in so young a woman, was perfectly appailing. Circumstance and education had given these cumstance and education had given these dangerous qualities a peculiar direction. The times in which she lived were peculiar, and she was, from her cradle, wrapped round in an atmosphere of politics. Her father lived for politics. In the circle in which he moved nothing but politics was talked from morning till night. Politics formed her whole idea of life and society. Being singularly impressible, and only too ready to take en active interest in anything that was active interest in anything that was an active interest in anything that was brought before her notice, she caught the contagion fully. But, unhappily, hers was one of these minds that are never satisfied unless they are in chronic opposition to the general or predominant views taken by the world in which they move. Of course, this love of opposition for its own sake is anything but uncommon. But while the Lydia Languishes of her age and acquaitance were dreamof her age and acquaitance were dream-ing of romantic elopements with im-pecunious ensigns simply because their pecunious ensigns simply because friends wished them to marry sensibly and to be well off in the world she was bent upon saying and doing things that made everybody stare, simply because her friends wished her to live the life of a cenventional fine lady, and either not to think for herself at all, or else to think as she was told. It was certainly not that she in reality likely being a fine lady lass, but that she loved opposition more. Had she been a woman opposition more. Had she been a woman of real genius or genuine independence of character, she would very likely have made a name for herself, but, as it was, she only got called names by the society in which she lived, which could not comprehend how an English girl of good family could even play at holding such strange and revolutionary notions as hers.

The truth was, that considering her character, there was nothing more strange in her holding these notions than there would have been in her holding the very opposite, had circumstances been different. She was simply wild, romantic in her own way, and ambitious of notoriety. Had her father and his set been the friends of Mr. Fox, she would, on the same principle, and with no more reason, have called herself a Tory of the extremest sort; but, as he and his friends were steady supporters of the cabinet of that day. she was bound, in order to be in her natural state of opposition, to take up with the other extreme. Not only so, but her natural tendency to eccentricity, which, in her childhood, had led her to scorn dolls, and to rebel against needlework, caused her, when she grew up, to affect a learned and philosophical contempt for the usual amusements and pursuits of her age and station. Her heroes were Washington and Lafayette; her authors Godwin and Rousseau. She scribbled a little herself, both in wild prose and vapid verse, and even carried her speculations into regions to which a young, unmarried woman is generally supposed not to possess the key. As may be easily imagined, her father—who never had time to see very much of her, who was quite unable to control her, and who could not in the least understand her, partly, no doubt, because the greater hers.
The truth was, that considering her nothing more could not in the least understand her, partly, no doubt, because the greater share of her obstinacy was a part of her inheritance—was terribly annoyed, and even alarmed. It was certainly not a pleasant thing for him to hear the

she cared to go through the ceremony of marriage at all. Of course, in fancying any such thing he only showed how little he understood her real character. Her republican ideas did not in the least affect her family pride, which was greater than his own. But the mistake, under the circumstances, was not unnatural; and he was accordingly delighted when, after many unpleasant demestic scenes, his wife's sister, Mrs. Lester, offered, for a time, to relieve him of this enfant terrible.

But, as has been said already, they became good friends again before he died; and woe now to any one who, in her presence, should drop a slighting word even of my Lord Castlereagh. Her opinions had changed, but not her nature. Nevertheless, with all her politics and all her narrowness, she was a very good woman in her way. She tried with all her strength to do what she thought was right, and she hated with all her soul what she thought was wrong. Doubtless she would have been a better woman still—better, at least, as a woman—had it been her lot to have had children of her own upon whom to expend some of the spare energy of her nature. She had, to a great extent, endeavored to supply the want by adopting, not only as her heir, but as her son, the orphan grandchild of Mrs. Lester, who was now, like Mark Warden, about to proceed to Cambridge. Certainly in every material sense the chosen heir of Earl's Dene was to be accounted one of fortune's favorites. With whatever faults or drawbacks it might have—for nothing is quite perfect—no finer place, no better estate could well be found, out of the hands of the peerage, in all England. If, in addition to the enjoyment of its real advantages, its owner should take a fancy to have a handle to his name, he would have but to ask and to obtain. New York, Jan. 11.—Sir Robert Ball, professor of astronomy of the University of Cambridge, England, delivered a lecture in Columbia University yesterday on "The Cause of An Ice Age." He explained that the ice age was due to the influence of the planets Venus and Jupiter on the course of the earth's revolution around the sun, and the change of orbit from a circle to an ellipse. He said also that there would be another ice age when Venus, Jupiter and the earth were in a certain position as regarded one another.—This would not happen for several thousands of years.

It was a soft and fine June evening in the year 181—, so wonderfully soft and fine indeed, that it was the very type of what an evening ought to be in that best of months. NATIONAL TOURNEY.

Buffalo, Jan. 13.—The entries for the national bowling tournament, which will begin here on Jan. 20, and continue during the week, have closed, and have filled beyond expectations. Representative bowlers of this country and Canada have entered, either as individuals or in teams of two and five men. The Palace alleys, eight in number, will be used. They are entirely new. Manager Floss is engaged in arranging the playing schedule. The five men teams will play first, and at the conclusion of that series the two man teams will follow, the individual matches being the last to be bowled. Bowling will begin at 7 o'clock on the evening of Jan. 20. # OLD LONDON

An Epidemic of the Disease and a Scare Anticipated.

Great Demand for Lymph—The Situation in Ontario-Number of New Cases.

London, Jan. 13:-The manager of one of the largest transatlantic lines was asked if he expected an unusual number of Americans to be present in London at the time of the cornation of King Edward. He said:
"No. By May I fear we shall have such a smallpox scare and epidemic, that London will be quarantined when King Edward is crowned." That this is by no means a pessimistic forecast is evidenced by the fact that the line referred to has begun to have the crews of its ships vaccinated prior to leaving London for New York. Other lines are following its example, fearing that, any day, the American authorities may place London shipping under an embargo on account of small-pox. The vaccination of the crews is only a preliminary to the same operation in the cases of passengers.

On all sides of the United Kingdom extensive and alarming precautions are on foot to deal with the unprecedented outbreak. The total of small-pox cases in London now only amounts to about 900, but the cases are so scattered that they create the greatest anxiety. London's laboratories are all phenomenally busy in turning out lymph, thousands of tubes of which are daily supplied, but even so the demand cannot be met. Almost all of the large firms are ordering their employes to be vaccinated. Corporations are ap-propriating sums for the erection of smallpox additions to the hospitals, while several steamers have been purchased in London for the accommodation of the present and expected pa-

Expert opinion prophesies that the epidemic will not reach its height until

May. Toronto, Jan. 13 .- A case of smallpox was discovered Friday night on a Canada Atlantic Railway coach at Mada-waska. He came from Bucknam's Mills. Another case was placed in quarantine at Sault Ste. Marie. This one came from a mining camp at Goulais Bay. The expense of quarantining and keeping patients of this nature are charged to the companies who permit their escape—a regulation which has been in force since last May, and which, Dr. Bryce reports, has effected great things in preventing the spread of the disease. Nine new cases were reported Saturday from Cambridge township, Russell county. The infection came from Booth's Mills, Hull. Two cases are reported from Esquesing township, Halton. "Our great satisfaction," said Dr. Bryce, "is the fact that although outside points are causing us plenty of trouble, we have been able to prevent the spread of the disease within our own boundaries to a large extent." A striking illustration of the way smallpox spreads is furnished in the outbreak at Peterboro. It appears a bundle of clothes was sent from Ottawa to Peterboro to be dyed. There after handling the parcel in the dyer's office Miss Frise contracted the disease, not having been vaccinated. William Joyce developed disease from some clothes which had been handled by the young lady. The man was moved to the hospital at Peterboro, and later to a tent were he was completely isolated. Both cases have been quarantined and all the people who received parcels from the dyer's office vaccinated.

He was promptly bound hand and foot and conveyed to Mexico, where he was bound to a tree and cruelly tortured to death. Battery Invented by Edison Makes It Possible—Windmills To Be Used to Run the Dynamos.

Chicago, Jan. 13.-The use of a belt of Chicago, Jan. 13.—The use of a belt of windmills to light the entire city of Chicago, was presented as a possibility of the future by Franklin H. Head in a lecture before the students in the College of Commerce and Administration at the University of Chicago.

The picture which Mr. Head suggest-The picture which Mr. Head suggest-ed was a series of windmills running dynamos which would charge storage batteries with electricity. This state-ment was made to illustrate the enor-mous value to the world of a new stor-age battery invented by Edison. Mr. Head had a model of the battery on the chapel desk before him, and made reference to it in a digression from an interesting lecture on "The Steel In-reference to it in a digression from an interesting lecture on "The Steel Industry."

"When I was in New York recently my old friend, Mr. Edison, told me of a new storage battery he has invented," said Mr. Head, after some apologetic remarks in reference to his digression.

"If what he thinks is true, he has made a most valuable storage battery for electricity. The lead storage battery in use on one street car line today is too expensive; it weighs seven tons, and has to be recharged after every four-mile trip. The new battery Mr. Edison has invented weighs in proportion one-fourth and seems indestructible. He has had batteries in his laboratory a year and a half, and they have kept their charges of electricity. His invention is of enormous value to the world.

"There are endless sources of power about us, if only the power they afford could be stored up. Take the windmillit is not constant. But with the new Edison storage battery the windmill could run a dynamo when the wind blows and the power generated could be saved in a storage battery.

"A belt of windmills around Chicago, say for forty miles, could supply storage batteries with enough electricity to light the whole city of Chicago constantly, and possibly to heat it, too.

batteries with enough electricity to light the whole city of Chicago constantly, and possibly to heat it too.

"For manufacturing purposes the storage battery would prove of great value. Take a factory where the manufacturer has 100 horse power provided constantly. At noon, when the plant is shut down, there is a great waste. With the use of battery the manufacturer could much more to him. By the use of a much more to him. By the use of a dynamo and a storage battery, he could have his windmill do the threshing and cut the corn for fodder, while his wife could have it to heat the flat-irons and do the churning. He might put up three windmills and heat his house without the use of fuel."

Mr. Head explained that Mr. Edison had developed a new oxide of iron, an oxide which never occurs in nature, and an unknown composition of nickel, which were used as the poles of the new batwere used as the poles of the new bat
