A few minutes after five yesterday aftermoon the Prince of Wales stepped into the council chamber at the city hall, and the business of meeting the citizens of Toronto got under way.

It is estimated that his royal highness shook hands with sixty persons per minute, which is quite the best record for that brand of indoor sport in this country. Indeed, so well did he do this, and with such little apparent fatigue, that Thomas L. Church was heard to send up several sighs of envy, Tommy, as you know, being the champion long-distance hand-shaker of Canada.

Those who gathered there were, perhaps, the most cosmopolitan. In any case the reception was democratic all the way, but most particularly so when a little chap without either shoes or stockings, and with the top part of a bathing suit doing the work of shirt, ambled in with his cap planted firmly on his head and with his cap hibition yesterday, after she had had a look at the prince. The rumor circulated some weeks ago that the northwest corner of King and Yonge streets had been sold by the King Street Realty Company is now confirmed, the Imperial Bank of Canada being the purchasers. There was no false note anywhere, and real wisdom was displayed in relaxing the first arrangements and including the city hall and the citizens in the program.
