WHERE ONE OF NATION'S BEST WORKS GOES ON Boys' Home in Ottawa Makes The Man of Tomorrow—Hundred and Fifty in Four Years

To help boys to help themselves is perhaps as lofty and altruistic a work as can be imagined. The destiny of the Canada of tomorrow rests largely on the boy of today, so that it is primarily essential that he should have all the considerations possible.

Four years ago D'Arcy Scott, W. H. Bowie and others realized that there were a number of boys in Ottawa who were homeless, without an opportunity to get the right training which would make them useful men. The sequel to their realization was the Boys' Home of today at 161 George street, one of the most useful institutions in the city.

Since the opening in May, 1908, 130 boys have passed through the home, practically every one of that number being a useful trade and is giving hopes of developing into a useful citizen.

For example, a boy named Tom who is an orphan at an age when he is ready to go to work, or he may be a young parentless immigrant of any such home, and he is induced to make an effort to pay his way for everything he gets.

Since the building was bought several changes have been made. A gymnasium, playground and other improvements have been made. This year shower baths are to be installed as well as other alterations which will make the home more attractive to the boys.

Much good work has been done by the ladies of the home. Mrs. H. H. Brown, president of the home, and other officers are anxious to improve the lot that the boys have in the home.

At the annual meeting of the home held last Monday an optimistic statement was made by John Way, who has been the manager for the past four years, resigned, and is now in charge of the home.

Some idea of the high opinion of the boys that is being given to the home is evidenced by the demand from employers for boys from the home. There is more demand for boys than can be supplied. There are at present twenty boys in the home.

Montreal, April 10—A woman best all the men in the opening sale of lots for the Canadian Northern's new townsite back of Mount Royal. Mrs. A. P. Sinar was the first purchaser to arrive, an hour before the sale was scheduled to start, and she bought her husband along.

Although the truth never at any time reached western dimensions, at nine o'clock Mr. Darling estimated that 100,000 worth of lots had been sold.

SICK PEARLS The strange quality of pearls by which their radiance and beauty diminish if they are not constantly worn is well known to every one, says the Paris correspondent of the Standard.

BROADWAY PACE CUTS LIFE SHORT Son of Noted Kentucky General Dies Suddenly in Turkish Bath After Going in Strong

New York, April 10—The life of the bright lights of New York cut short the career of Breckenridge Castleman of the Kentucky Castleman family, who died in Murray Hill Turkish bath in West Forty-second street. Under forty years old, more than six feet tall, bright and handsome, Castleman was a welcome acquisition to the southern colony in New York on his arrival a few years ago, but of late he had kept away from his old friends and had drifted into circles of society they did not frequent.

Castleman was the eldest son of General John E. Breckenridge Castleman of Louisville. In his native town Breckenridge Castleman was particularly fond of a youth and a young man. His likable personality, aided by his family and his social position, had won for him a wide acquaintance. He was a social accumulator and a fortune in his own right.

It was something more than three years ago when Breckenridge Castleman was having used up all his own funds in keeping pace with the fast life of Broadway, he was dependent upon his people back home. He made an arrangement with Louis Jacoby of No. 228 East Eleventh street, by which he was to be sheltered and fed and kept supplied with a limited amount of spending money from an allowance supplied by General Castleman.

Although he was practically penniless, Breckenridge Castleman had good clothes, and he knew how to wear them. He knew how to conduct himself in any company. At times he would associate with men he had known in his days of prosperity and would live regularly at the Jacoby home, apparently engaged in bringing himself for an attempt at rebuilding his fortunes.

At such times he was optimistic and enthusiastic. He would readily formulate plans and outline actions looking to a resumption of a business career. Then he would disappear and in his days of poverty and would live regularly at the Jacoby home, apparently engaged in bringing himself for an attempt at rebuilding his fortunes.

Although General Castleman was liberal in his allowance, Breckenridge Castleman was not so liberal in his own. He was a miser and was known for his stinginess. He would shut down the allowance.

After long persuasion from his family and Jacoby, Breckenridge Castleman consented two weeks ago, to enter a sanitarium at Westport, Conn.

One week of the sanitarium sufficed. He came back to New York, and being unable to find a room, he remained at the Hotel Belmont, where he remained two days. He had no money, but his appearance caused a genuine indignation among the staff of the hotel. He had a considerable sum of checks. An intrepid demand for a settlement he was given to Jacoby's home.

An amount sufficient to defray his debt was given to Castleman. He went out and spent it. Later he appeared at Jacoby's home and asked for his overcoat. Jacoby refused to give it to him, fearing he would pawn it, and Castleman summoned a policeman who refused to interfere. Castleman went away in a lowering rage.

The weather turned so bad and cold that Jacoby gave him an overcoat. He pawned the coat, and at 9 o'clock at night he entered the Murray Hill bath, where he was last seen. His credit had run out and he went into the hot room to prepare for a Turkish bath.

His condition was such that the attendant kept close watch upon him. After a short time he began to groan and was carried to a cot. There he was suddenly seized with a hemorrhage. An ambulance was called from Flower hospital, where he died at the hands of Doctor Andrews, the ambulance surgeon.

The bereavement falls with redoubled effect upon General Castleman, who died a few months ago Major David Castleman, an older son, died in California, following a separation from his wife, who was Miss Bailey of Lexington.

STAGING FIRE SCENES FOR MOVING PICTURES Interesting Account of How Film Companies Make Them Seem Realistic

"The first thing to do when we have a scene to stage," says Harry O'Neil, the managing director of one of the Lubin stock companies, "is to find a vacant house in the regular city stations and to get too far from our plan. The owner of the house is usually willing to loan his property for any purpose on condition that we do not really burn it down and that we pay for all doors and windows which we have to smash in putting on the scene realistically."

When the actors have learned their parts and the sun is in the right position, the chemist gets his smoke and flame producers ready for business. Just how the regular city stations are waiting for the signal to get into the picture. The mob of excited spectators who give their faces to the fire scene supplies itself without effort or expense on our part. The mere sight of the fire engine is sufficient to attract a big crowd.

"Now everything is ready. From one of the upper windows comes a puff of smoke. Up the street the engine dashes at a furious gallop, followed by the volunteer mob.

"Motion picture audiences like a lot of door smashing and window breaking with their feet and never spare any expense to give them all they want. Of course the front door is always locked and a half dozen husky firemen batter their way through it with axes. (Others smash the windows on the lower floor with utility disregard of the cost of plate glass. At the time—thanks to the chemist—thick smoke is growing denser and fiery tongues of flame show at every window.

"Now the work of rescue begins. A little child is brought out through the front door. Several men and women are dragged through the upper windows and brought down the ladders. It's all so realistic that the crowd does not need any coaching to applaud the rescue.

"One of the men who frequently has a part in our fire scenes is a little dog which is always at his heels. When he dashes into the burning house the dog fearfully follows. Presently the dog appears to leap from one of the upper windows. The feat always gets a round of applause just as it will later when shown in the films.

"Of course there's always one woman left in the burning building—the heroine of the play. Quite often this part falls to Miss May Buckley, who plays the leading role in so many of our dramas. The rescued people beg the firemen to save her.

"Although flames are belching from every window and the walls and roof seem on the verge of falling, one brave fire ladie dashes up the ladder to the top floor and climbs through the window. Taking their one from our own actors, the spectators turn their heads away in horror as he disappears in the flames.

"But after a breathless moment or two he is sure to reappear with one arm of around Miss Buckley's apparently senseless form. Out through the window he drags her and down the ladder.

"All this time, of course, the engine has been pumping water on the flames and various other things incidental to firefighting have been happening for the benefit of the camera. But with the heroine safe and the usual fire scene comes to an end. The manufactured smoke and flames quickly fade away and the house is left as it was before the fire. The condition of Edwin Stirling, I. C. driver, was reported as little improved today.
