Under-Currents By The Duchess

One moon-flower making all the foam-flowers fair. Though all those waves went over us, and drove Deep down the stifling lips and down, the first would not care.

The first eager desire for dancing has come to an end. It is the hour when one has grown discriminating, and when capricious beauties review their cards, and carefully scratch out such a one as put in one more desirable. The best dancers have had time to make themselves known, and mental notes about them are being freely made. Supper becomes a thing no longer vague, and the married dancers are glad of a little champagne or ice cup of any sort to restore their flagging energies. It is, indeed, upon the stroke of midnight.

So far, Lady Riversdale's dance has been a complete success. The lord-lieutenant of the county is here and this last season's most fashionable beauty, an extremely smart gown—not an old one that has seen service, and yet might be considered good enough to dazzle the rusties, but a distinctly new gown, built for the occasion.

It is intensely warm, and all the windows are flung wide. Through them comes the glimmer of coloured lamps from the gardens outside and, conquering them, the cold, haughty, still fire of the moon. Vera attracted by it has drawn close to an open door in one of the conservatories, and the moonlight has been her partner on some trivial errand, gazed out with a little thrill of pleasure at the perfect scene the night affords.

For past the foolish lamps that seem to twinkle with such a barren effect lies the great ocean, swelling, gleaming, in the mystic beams of the great goddess in the sky above.

Is it no Cynthia, she that never sleeps. But walks about high heaven all the night?

The night is still as death itself, and the sparkling brilliance of the slowly moving waters contrasts with it in tender fashion. Strangely attracted by it Vera goes forward, moves down the stone steps that lead to the garden, and with eager footsteps gains the little pathway, steep and sudden, that leads to the beach.

She is alone. As her feet touch the hard, smooth sand, a sense of exultation fills her, a taste to stretch out her hands to the delicate silvery waves, to clasp them, to press them to her feverish brow, takes possession of her. Was ever scene so fair?

Surely Love walked upon the sea this tranced night.

For the waves beneath his feet ran pale with silver light.

Suddenly she draws in her arms, and a shiver runs through her; she turns her head to see Dyrart.

He has started violently on seeing her, and even in the moonlight she can see that he has grown terribly pale. "I am unfortunate!" is all he can say, but his tone is eloquent.

She ignores it; perhaps in her own agitation she does not even hear it. "Again?" she says with a withering smile. Her shut lip curls. "Surely it is not necessary? You can see for yourself that I am alone."

"I swear you misjudge me," cries he in deep emotion. "I did not—I could not—know you were here."

"That of course," she shrugs her shoulders with an air of disgust. "Hear me," says Dyrart unsteadily; "however you may misjudge me, there is at least something I must say to you. This morning I insulted you, I spoke to you as—good Heaven, I must have been—I was mad—when I so spoke—but is there no forgiveness?"

"None," coldly.

"That is impossible!" cries he fiercely. "I will not believe it! I could not live if I thought that! Look into it, Vera, in common fairness, remember what it was you said to me, what it was you accused me of and then see if pardon is impossible."

"If I said anything to offend you, I spoke only the truth," says she unreluctantly; "but even so—well, if I did offend—I regret it"—her tone is icy. "Will that do? will you leave me now?"

"Truth? There was no truth," says he passionately.

"Shall I say then it was false?" wearily. "If I do, will that suffice?"

"I shall I the at last be alone? Oh, miserably, 'am I never to escape this persecution?"

"You can escape it when you like, it seems to me," sullenly.

"How, how?" excitedly. "You say that, when you know there is no escape possible. See here then," turning to him and holding out to him her lovely bare white arms, rounded, and as soft as a little child's, "if what you and your father desire is my imprisonment, I will return to Greycourt, at once, to-morrow. Only see that Griselda may remain; she can dance to be happy here."

"Do you think I want you to return? Don't you know," with a bitter glance at her, "that from my soul I wish you had never come beneath my roof? And as to your want, I say again, why need you? There is—Shelton."

She looks quickly at him, leaning a little forward as if surprised, as if in expectation, and the moonbeams catching her so, make for him a lasting picture of her, unutterably sweet, unutterably cruel. It is plain that she is waiting for his next words; with difficulty he speaks them.

"You are going to marry him?" he says, his tone more assertive than questioning.

"It is an impertinent question," says Miss Dyrart coldly, "but if it will help to end this interview, I shall answer it. You are entirely wrong, Lord Shelton has not so much as asked me to marry him."

"You are disingenuous. If he has not yet asked you, you know he only waits the opportunity to do so."

"When he does," he checks him abruptly, knowing he has gone too far.

Tells Dyspeptics What To Eat

Avoid Indigestion, Sour Acid Stomach, Heartburn, Gas on Stomach, Etc.

Indigestion and practically all forms of stomach trouble, say medical authorities, are due nine times out of ten to an excess of hydrochloric acid in the stomach. Chronic "acid stomach" is exceedingly dangerous and sufferers should do either one of two things. Either they can go on a limited and often disagreeable diet, avoiding foods that disagree with them, that irritate the stomach and lead to excess acid secretion or they can eat as they please in reason and make it a practice to counteract the effect of the harmful acid and prevent the formation of gas, sourness or premature fermentation by the use of a little Bismarck Magnesia at their meals.

There is probably no better, safer or more reliable stomach antacid than Bismarck Magnesia and it is widely used for this purpose. It has no direct action on the stomach and is not a digestant. But a teaspoonful of the powder or a couple of live grain tablets taken in a little water with the food will neutralize the excess acidity which may be present and prevent its further formation. This removes the whole cause of the trouble and the meal digests naturally and healthfully without need of pepsin pills or artificial digestants.

Get a few ounces of Bismarck Magnesia from any reliable druggist. Ask for either powder or tablets. It never comes as a liquid, milk or citrate and in the bisulphate form is not a laxative. Try this plan and eat what you want at your next meal and see if this isn't the best advice you ever had on "what to eat."
