injury was not of any grave character.

The accident was characterized by all the sensational features following a collision at sea. There was the heavy jolt, the grind of crushing steel, the frantic rush for the čecks, the lowering of the boats, and rescue of the passengers, and then the perilous journey for a mile or two in a frail craft across a shimmering sea to the other vessel.

In the first boat lowered were three women, one of them with a baby tied securely to her bosom. Two men were let down the ladders and in a few minutes the crew which manned the boat were pulling heroically through the darkness toward the Hurona.

The second boat, with its quota of human freight, left about a quarter of an hour after, followed by a third and a fourth bees. Henry Smythe leaves to-morrow for the west on a business trip. It is understood that it is Mr. Smythe's intention to meet certain real estate men, who have recently disposed of western property belonging to him for a sum in the neighborhood of $18,000.

There are also broad hints to the effect that on his return he intends to announce himself as a candidate for the mayoralty of Chatham for 1908.

The absence of his wife from the his work, but this time in North

The absence of his wife from the oity, it appears, was the signal for the commencement of a merry joilification on the part of a well-known local benedict. This is not drawn attention to as an unusual thing, but is noted morely from the bearing it had on certain misfortunes which befel the gent'eman in question shartly after wifie's departure from the city.

As might be surmised, the husbind got lonesome a short time after he returned from work that evening. He started out in search of "the boys," and as those in the know will agree "the boys" are easily found, especially when the seeker has money in his pooket to spend. Mr. Marriedman was soon renewing the acquaintances of his youth, and during the evening his health was invariably the subject of the many toasts which were made and occassionally responded to. All was merry till the dreaded morning after, when the celebrant woke up to discover that his gold watch and chain had been lifted.

The loss of these articles has been reported to the police, who are now endeavoring to locate them if possible.
