Which Was The Heir?

CHAPTER XXX.
SHE placed this letter on a little plain deal dressing table where Betty could not fail to see it when she came to look for her; then she sat on the bed with her hands clasped and her head downcast, waiting for the dusk. She would not have long to wait, for the autumn days were drawing in quickly.
It is necessary to say that the thought of Geoffrey to the exclusion of everything and everyone else? In all her young life, perhaps, she had never been so unhappy; no, not even when she had been kidnapped by Sheehey, and was being carried away from Geoffrey; for even at that moment the hope of seeing Geoffrey again had sustained her and lent her courage; but now she hoped and almost prayed that she might not see him again.
When the light began to fail she softly unbolted the door and listened. She was alone in the house, for old Betty had gone to town. With the parcel in which she had tied her boy's clothes, she stole out of the cottage and glided by the back gate across the fields to the path through the woods by which she could gain the high road to the station. There was no one in sight; the servants were preparing the dinner at the castle, the labourers were when she reached the wood she paused and looked round, and, selecting a large thorn bush, carefully hid her parcel, covering it with the new fallen leaves.

She sighed as she did so, for she felt as if she were burying her past life in which she had been the boy Ronnie, Geoffrey's friend and well-beloved companion. It was like ending a chapter of her life, with the rest of the book a volume of blank or blurred pages lying spread out before her. The tears started to her eyes as she cast a glance at the bush which stood as a kind of monument over the grave of her lost happiness.
She was no longer "Ronnie," Geoffrey's Ronnie, the boy who had worked and played beside Geoffrey, who had loved and been loved by him, but—what? Miss Constance Lorton, she supposed.
With her head downcast and the unshed tears in her eyes, she walked to the station and enquired for a train for London. She found that the night mail left in a little over an

ACCIDENTS

ACCIDENTS will happen in every path of life, and once the tissues are irritated it is an easy matter for disease germs to make entry into the blood. Once they are permitted to do this for the air is full of microbes and it is easy to enter the body they commence their deadly work and develop ugly sores and very often blood poisoning. The deadly effect of the latter is apparent to everyone—every mother, wife or sister should therefore protect the lives of their families by keeping on hand a box of Dr. Bovel's Herb & Gum Salve—the greatest antiseptic healing and soothing salve the world has known. The timely use of the salve prevents festering and blood poisoning, for no microbe or disease germ can live where Dr. Bovel's Herb and Gum Salve is used. As a principle it is a marvel, and never fails to soothe and then heal.

A Fashionable Gown.

An unusually attractive costume is here shown. It was most effectively developed in raisin colored henrietta, with a braided design in lilac and green, and pipings of Dresden silk in the same colors. The shirt is cut in seven gores, and has a plaited insert at the side gores. The waist is made with a round yoke over bib or berth portions, and the sleeve is composed of a cap shaped upper part to which is joined a puff that is finished at the wrist with a band cuff. The waist pattern is cut in 6 sizes—32, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 inches bust measure, and requires 2 1/2 yards of 44 inch material for the 36 inch size. The shirt is cut in 5 sizes—22, 24, 26, 28, 30 inches waist measure, and requires 4 1/2 yards of 44 inch material for the 24 inch inch size.
This illustration calls for two separate patterns, and will be mailed to any address on receipt of 10c. in stamps or silver.

hour; and she walked up and down the platform lost in thought and her own unhappiness.
As the time approached for the departure of the train one or two passengers dropped in—farmers, cattle dealers. She recognised them all, and held her breath, regretting for the moment that she wore a female attire; but, to her relief, no one recognised her as seemed to noticed her; for the tailor-made costume was a quiet one, and one eminently suited to her purpose.
A down train arrived before the up one was due, and several passengers got out. As they came across the line she saw Sidney Bassington amongst them. She drew back, away from the light of the lamp, and trembled; for now some fear was mingled with her dislike of him.
She watched him as he passed her and went his way, with the station-master and porter obviously touching their hats and waiting upon him. He looked pale and rather haggard, and his dark eyes, under their rather drooping lids, glanced from side to side in a furtive way, and he turned the big cigar about in his lips as if his composure were rather assumed and he was ill at ease.
She drew a breath as he disappeared. In some vague way it seemed to her that he was closely connected with this short period of her life which she had spent under the shadow of Starborough Castle.
The up train came puffing into the station. She waited until the other passengers had taken their seats, then she slipped into the third-class compartment and took a seat in the corner far from the door. The station-master came up with his polite and mechanical:
'Where to, miss?'
Cottie did not reply for a moment, for the "Miss" sounded strangely in her ears, and did not seem addressed to her; then, as he stared at her waiting, she said, almost breathlessly:
'London,' and he closed the door with the usual slam.
It was a fairly fast train; passengers got in and out, and every time it entered her carriage Cottie had a little sensation of fear, for it seemed to her that everyone would notice some strangeness in her dress; but most of them merely glanced at her. At one station, however, a gentleman got in, and after making himself comfortable, looked at her with some interest. She had found the veil but not uncomfortable, and she had raised it. She had not the least idea that his interest was aroused by her beauty.

'Would you like the window closed?' he asked, as a preface to conversation; but Cottie shook her head and drew back still farther into her corner; so, being a gentleman, and seeing that she was nervous and shy, he let her alone.
After a time, worn out by the stress of her emotion, and by the unaccounted swinging of the train, she fell asleep, and slept until they were entering one of the stations near London. The awakening was painful, for back came the flood of memory, the sense of Geoffrey lost forever, the question of what she was to do, where she was to go, now that she was no longer a boy, no longer Ronnie Bell, Geoffrey's brother, but Miss Constance Lorton.
A paper boy came up to the window yelling the London morning papers. She bought one, and, hoping to dispel her thoughts for even a few minutes, looked at it absently. She was glancing down the front page, when suddenly, to her amazement, she saw her own name.

Now, she knew that "Ronnie" was an uncommon name, and therefore there was some excuse for her astonishment in seeing it among the advertisements of a London newspaper; but her surprise became greater as she read the lines:
'If Ronnie Bell, who came over in the "Capricorn" will communicate with Mrs. Sefton, 24 Montague Square, Brighton, he will hear of something to his advantage.'

Cottie stared at these pregnant words in a kind of stupor. She remembered Mrs. Sefton, of course—the lady who had been so kind to her on board the ship. But why should she want to see her—advertise for her? What could she have to say to her? What could she have to tell her that would be to her advantage? Was Geoffrey at the back of this? It seemed scarcely likely. If Geoffrey had wanted to find her he would have made enquiries for her at Starborough instead of making love to Eva Rasleigh.
