

The Braes of Yarrow

An Historical Tale of the Sixteenth Century.

A pause, during which Mistress Douglas continued to pace the floor; and Gilbert lay musing upon her singular revelation. At length he said— 'What would you do? 'I would save him, if that were possible, from the ruin to which he is rushing. Gilbert shook his head discouragingly— 'Think you he can be turned from his bent? 'He may be shown its madness—or he may be frustrated. 'That will be no easy task. 'I have surely a few friends to aid me. 'I am one of them. 'You?—her face brightened for an instant and then grew dark; 'but no there is danger— 'I am not afraid, he said as if somewhat pained by the suggestion. 'But I am, for your sake, she cried as the impulsive words left her lips, and again became pallid— 'I mean that—I do not wish to be more indebted to you than I am already. 'I am the debtor, and shall think that you hold my friendship without value if you refuse my aid in this. 'I am too poor in friends to slight any, and you I value most of all. 'Then I am with you in aught that you do, come good or ill. 'You shall be my first councillor and general. There is my hand. 'She smiled half sadly as he pressed it reverently to his lips. 'I shall be well to-morrow, since you need my help. 'No compliments, or I leave you. 'I shall be gruff as Tushielaw himself if so you would have me. 'Be what you will, but be secret. 'Ay, as the grave. I will but report myself to Captain Lindsay, obtain a few weeks' grace— 'Stop, stop, you must not be in such haste to see Captain Lindsay. 'And wherefore, since it is my duty? 'She turned away her face again, while she spoke as if to conceal her agitation. 'You have already been absent four weeks without permission, and— 'Go on—why do you stop? Do I lose my commission? 'Worse: you may be condemned to death for desertion, which is equivalent to treason. 'His countenance was overshadowed with the consciousness of a new difficulty. 'I will straight to Edinburgh, no less, as soon as my limbs have strength enough to steady me in the saddle. 'She would have pleaded with him to be wary, but a tap at the door interrupted her. She answered the summons, something was whispered to her. She passed out, closing the door after her. 'The summoner was Kirsty Hyalop. This strange creature, who has been so frequently mentioned in this chronicle, was a woman whose appearance was as peculiar as her reputation. 'She would have been tall had she not stooped so much that she appeared to be rather under than over the average height. Her body was stout—not fat—and her hands were long and marked on the back by veins and sinews. Her features were harsh and haggard, forming a singular contrast to her robust body; and her eyes were as red and fiery as those of the basilisk. To conceal them she had apparently contracted a habit of keeping the lids half-closed, so that she looked always as if she was half asleep. When she raised the eyelids the effect of the large burning eyes were all the more startling. Her dress was composed of a petticoat of the commonest stuff, striped red, a short gown of brownish hue, and a large red kerchief wound round her head so as to conceal her brow partly and her hair entirely. For the rest she was reticent to a degree, and singularly noiseless in her movements. Her age was as great a mystery as her life. The oldest men of the country-side declared themselves to have been familiar with the dreaded name of Kirsty Hyalop for their very infancy. 'She lived upon the contributions of the country folk who sought her assistance in sickness and distress. Their propitiatory gifts were enough to have enabled her to live well; yet she always seemed to be in poverty. Some said her evil master carried away the greater share of her profits; but there were also strange tales told of gifts of produce finding their way mysteriously into the hovels of the poor. There had been talk of burning her at one time, but she had somehow hitherto escaped the usual fate of acknowledged witches. That might have been partly on account of the protection extended to her by Sir Walter Spens of Halstane when his word was of import in Etrick and Yarrow.
