The "Breviarium," with its ever varying round of social and commemorative devotions, the bond of charity and intercommunion among the saints; the "Missale," with its right of ineffable mystery, the centre and cardinal point of all; the "Rituale," with its more private, personal, and domestic solemnities, hallowing our christian pilgrimage from the cradle to the tomb; and not least, the 'Pontifical,' whereon the Church seems to speak as from her throne, clad in her glorious apparel, and wielding the ensigns of her royal power but none the less the mother, because "every inch the Queen" what a repository is it, of holy words and august traditions, the records of daily experience, the remnants of Apostolic testimony, the offerings, rich beyond the wealth "of Crinus and of Ind," which the tide of centuries has deposited upon the shores of our favoured Mother land, and those centuries, 'the ages of faith!' And when from the amazement which follows on so vast an idea, we pass to a closer, yet withal reverent and loving scrutiny of the contents of this richly furnished casket, that we may not rather say, this priceless reliquary; what thoughts must not the search suggest, of wondering delight
