

the GATT talks are successful in limiting the degree of domestic protection to agricultural producers, the Chilean export subsidizing sector could face increasing foreign competition in particular from important grain producing countries such as Canada and the United States. Chile's export sector is highly competitive and subject to export subsidies and non-existing The main barrier to the development of this sector is tariff and non-tariff barriers in the developed world. These are particularly high in processed products like apple juice and cannot be removed without a reduction of these barriers resulting from a freer trade agreement. It is a substantial increase in exports of these products, probably including the adoption of new technologies and new methods of production in the agro-industrial sector. A major role will be played by The expansion of Canada in fruit growing and agro-industry could provide a market for the expansion of these sectors in case Chile joins NAFTA. Some large Canadian firms may become interested in establishing joint ventures with large local producers or exporters oriented to the international market.
