

MCGILL UNIVERSITY

Sir Arthur Currie.

2.

79 years of age, and I have great admiration for many things he has done, but his style rather grates on one's feelings at times, and reflects his own self-satisfaction rather too strongly. His article on page 39 on "Vocational Guidance" illustrates what I mean. You might note particularly the first three paragraphs of page 41.

Professor French remarked that a good deal of emphasis is laid on the manifest high destiny of the engineers of the United States, and this could be well reduced by say fifty percent without any loss.

While the book has distinct merits in many ways, we do not think that as a guide for a young man entering a business or a profession it is to be compared with "The Young Man in Business" by Davis, or with Gow's two little books on the "Humanistics".

I am returning the book with this letter.

Yours faithfully,

Dean.
