an Accuses Mary,

"It's 'Mary's fault," flashed Joan. The man's south manner of the man is good-looking, fairly.

By WINIFRED BLACK Copyright, 1915, by Newspaper Feature Service, Inc.

Some men are in love with love. So are some women. They are the most dangerous people in the world.

The third woman tried to kill herself because she was miserable, and in that state because she had done a thing that would not let her be happy. No, it isn't fate, or punishment, or justice that did it. It isn't even right or wrong—it's just what is and what must be. Not all the thinking in the world, not all the hoping and trusting—no, nor even all the praying—will turn a man who has deceived two women into a true and faithful humband.

It isn't the other women he meets who make a man unfaithful, it's the man himself.

Just for the Amusement.

A man who is in love with love is always a good deal in love with him-self, too. He doesn't really care for the woman he thinks he's in love with, he cares for himself, that's all.

Why Each One of Us Has a Distillery in His Blood

"It isn't," I said, "and, Joan, we'll please not speak of Mary. I love her incerely for all I'm on the verse of making a fool of myself about you." "Forgive me, Peter," said Joan con-tritely, "It-it's just that Mary isn't the mate I would have picked for you." "Mary is growing." I said with a sud-den startled sense of evolution in my pretty wife. I had watched it since we've been away from home, though I don't believe I had ever really faced the fact before tonight. "Growing." said Joan, "away from you." "What do you mean?"
