ignorance of common-place things, and you may joke her about it and call her Dora Copperfield. This is all very well for a time. These silly, good-for-nothing little Doras are pretty and interesting if they don't last too long. But only think of their living—instead of dying and leaving bequests to ugly little pug dogs—drifting on to the meridian of life, helpless, feeble, lazy or sick! Oh! I tell you, young man, that is a thorn which will pierce a man's side worse than a bundle of thistles."

NOVEMBER 2, 1882.

Disease in Winnipeg.

The correspondent of a Toronto paper writes: "The change of the seasons is in rapid process of accomplishment. In Manitoba spring and autumn are so short that the seasons may be said to consist of summer and winter, the one intensely cold and the other feebly hot. The intervening periods are decidedly unpleasant. Last spring was the most miserable spell of weather I ever experienced except this autumn. The misery and discomfort of this season of the year are due not so much to the weather itself as to the defective sanitary condition of the city, and want of public improvements. Of course these drawbacks are incidental to the rapid growth of the city, and will be removed without delay, but meantime their effects are sufficiently marked, and to put it mildly, unpleasant. At the time of the small pox scare I put myself under promise to say nothing about it, because the disease was imported, and energetic measures were being taken to stamp it out. The Medical Health Officer accomplished his work well, and the city has been free for some time from that scourge. But Winnipeg is now visited by an epidemic of typhoid fever, similar to that which two years ago swept over Toronto, and indeed, was more or less prevalent in the large cities of the continent. When making inquiries, I accidentally discovered that there were no fewer than forty cases of typhoid in the fever ward. The number now in the hospital is said to be 22. In the hospital at St. Boniface there were at the same time fifteen other cases. I have since learned that there are quite as many in the private, while not a few cases are 'isolated' in the city. The recent rains have made pools of water all over the city, and nothing can be worse for promoting typhoid. The air on the streets is laden with foul and pestiferous vapours, while the cesspools are reservoirs of fever-bearing filth. The spread of typhoid is nothing more or less than the penalty for a neglect of their sanitary habits, and so to my house are free. Where it is to end, heaven knows, for the winter tarries, and until we have been hard frost the source of the fever germ will not be sealed up. To clean the fifth street at present is quite impossible for the roads are next to impassible with mud. There are ten teams and beamsters enough to do the hauling for the city, but they could not be got, even were the roads in condition, to do such disagreeable work as is absolutely necessary. I have no doubt that the City Council will by next year have organized a scavenger system commensurate with the city's requirements; but meantime it is not pleasant to have three of your friends taken down within ten days, and to feel as if the shadow of the malady were resting upon yourself. It is in the nature of things that the change of the seasons here must always be accompanied by more or less sickness. The extremes are so great, and the oscillation from one to the other so rapid, and more or less of bilious complaints must be expected from the alkali in the water; but there is no excuse for the presence of typhoid fever in such an alarming volume, for that is due to a general disregard of cleanliness, a cause which can be remedied if the will exists."

Unlimited Poker.

A GAME OF "DRAW" WITH A "POT" OF NEARLY HALF A MILLION.

Mr. William H. Vanderbilt having denied the statement that he went to Denver, Cal., to play a game of draw poker with friends, it may be interesting to read the story which the railroad magazine pronounces to be false, and which appeared in the Denver Tribune. The reporter looked first through the key-hole of the door of the room in which Vanderbilt and his party were enjoying themselves. He could see nothing more than an indistinct group of human forms at a card table. They had placed an ear against the door-jam and settled into an easy attitude for a long, pleasant visit. In a few moments there was a suspicious "click, click," and somebody broke the sepulchral stillness that followed the closing of the door, with the remark: "Well, let's continue the game."

"I wonder if that—reporter has gone; it would be just like him to lay down at the door," said another voice.

"You bet he's gone," said a third. "Vanderbilt, it's your ante."

It was impossible to distinguish the voice.

Then there was a brief silence, which was only broken at intervals by "raise you a thousand," "five thousand better," "I call," "five hundred blind," "straddle," "O," "you passed me out on a pat flush," "what have you got?" "two small pair," "to your pot," etc.

"Hightit, what do you say if we increase the ante to a hundred?"

"All right, Bill; the game is terrible quiet."

"It's your ante, Keep."

The game moved along for a quarter of an hour or more, without an exclamation to indicate that there was any unusual strain.

"Schell, it is your ante this time."

"All right," and something that sounded like a handful of gold fell on the table. Schell's cheeks must have fallen short. "Bet a thousand."

"In it."

"I see that and raise you 10."

There was a canopy-bird, white, foliaged by a silencer's couple of minutes' duration; then a third said: "Well, I'll stay on a small pair; it's worth the percentage."

"All in!" asked the dealer. "What'll you have, Hightit?"

"One card."

"Keep."

"Two," came the mild response.

"And you, Vanderbilt?"

"Give me three."

"Well, I'll take two myself."

"What do you do, Hightit?"

"Pass."

"And you, Keep?"

"Well, I'll bet 10, for a starter."

"Two pair to go on; that's bad, but I'll raise you 20."

"Takes you 30, Schell."

More silence followed the "pass" word.

"That's let me out."

"What do you do, Vanderbilt?"

"I guess I'll have to stay; there's you, $70,000, and I'll lift you 50 more."

"Schell?"

"I'm out."

"Hightit, what do you do?"

"I call, what are you betting on?"

"I'll call a pair of sixes."

"Well, I've got a king full of two."

"Ah! but I mean I got two more sixes."

"What did you have Hightit?"

"Full on tens."

"And you, Schell?"

"I had a small full on eight spots."

The four hundred and odd thousand dollars was swept up without another word and the game proceeded, the reporter walking down stairs to the cigar stand and investing the remainder of his week's salary in a five-cent "snipe."
