

A CAST FOR FORTUNE.

constantly thought, ever with him: 'I shall see her again! But for that, everything would have been forgotten, and I would have been a ghost. Only day by day the longing for her presence gave more interest. Now and then it started him. Now and then it roused himself from his dream of expectation to ask, what he should do when the evening to which he looked forward so eagerly was over, when there was no longer anything to sustain him in the hopeless gaze of separation. 'I shall not blow out my tapers,' he would think, 'and that is the only thing which I am certain. I shall live, I shall work, and perhaps after a while I shall grow used to it, as one does grow used to all forms of suffering but beyond that I cannot look. Now will I look. She is coming. I shall see her, I shall touch her hand and meet her eyes again, and that is enough.'

Not for a long time had sleep been so sweet to Derwent as it was then. The consciousness of his cousin's friendly presence, so unobtrusive, but so sincere, when tried by the test most difficult to meet—seemed to revive his whole nature like strong wine. The faith that followed as firmly in his honor, and the sympathy that felt with him in his trouble, gave him that comfort which even the strongest nature stands in need of. He knew now what a strain it had been to bear his burden alone, and he said to himself that, helped by such friendship, his strength would be 'as the strength of ten' to redeem his father's honor and justify the confidence placed in his own mind.
