

intermission, by day and by night, he braved the pestilence and tracked the cholera-stricken city, whenever or wherever duty called him, to the homes of the rich or the poor, of the people of his own charge or of strangers. The last three years of his public life were spent in the Halifax District, of which he was Chairman. He was eminently distinguished for catholicity of spirit, for great singleness of purpose, and for unwearied zeal in the cause of God. Possessing a naturally cheerful disposition, and much of the power of true religion, he thoroughly enjoyed life and carried sunshine into every circle in which he moved. He loved his work, and was permitted to engage in it until the last. At the close of the Monday evening prayer meeting he was struck with paralysis, lingered through the night, but never spoke, and at a quarter past ten on Tuesday morning, the 15th of May, passed calmly away to the rest of Heaven. His departure was translation rather than death, and his own desire, often expressed, was fully realized,—

"My body with my charge lay down,
And cease at once to work and live."
