

"We were beginning to get anxious —"

"It's a long, way round, so I'll be late"

Anxious Hours are Fewer in the Home with a Telephone

WHAT a comfort it would be to you when any of your friends are ill, to be in constant touch with them—to know at all times how they are getting on.

You could do it if you had a telephone.

You probably have relatives living a few miles away whom you do not see for weeks at a time. How nice it would be if you could talk to them whenever you felt like it—without leaving your own home.

You could summon your doctor immediately, in case of illness. You could call your neighbors at once to your assistance in case of fire or accident. You could get anything required from your nearest town without loss of time. If one of the family is detained in town or on the road, those at home could be notified and relieved of anxiety.

A telephone in the house relieves many anxious moments.

Imagine too, the pleasure of being able to chat with your neighbors, in the evening, when your day's work is done.

A telephone in the home adds to the pleasures of every member of the family.

The man on the farm, who has a telephone, can talk over his work with his neighbors. He is in close touch with current news. If he is interested in politics he will find the telephone of the greatest convenience. At election times, he can get the returns—on election night—right in his own home.

Women who are interested in church work can confer with friends who are also interested. They can discuss social affairs.

Young people can visit with their friends. They can get up a party on the shortest notice.

Where there are children in the home the educational value of the telephone cannot be too highly estimated.

As a business proposition the telephone is of the greatest value.
