When Anchors Float.

Seaplanes Sometimes Raise Their Daring Storms.

Did you know that a seaplane takes as big an anchor as a battleship does! A battleship weighs about three thousand times as much as a seaplane. A five-ton anchor will hold a battleship safe through the heaviest storm. You would expect, then, that a seaplane anchor would be a thing you would carry in your hand. But, startling as it may seem, a seaplane needs a dreadnought anchor—an anchor nearly as heavy as itself.

The reason is curious but simple. When a storm blows, a ship tries to pull her anchor along the bottom of the sea. The flukes of the anchor catch round some projection and hold fast. It is the grip, not the weight, of a ship's anchor that keeps a ship safe. But a seaplane does not try to drag her anchor at all. She tries to lift it straight up.

Why? Well, for much the same reason that makes your cap or bowler hat fly off when you are out in a gale or travelling in a fast car. You may have noticed that it always flies up a little before falling on the road. It has to, in fact, in order to blow off at all.

The curved surface of the seaplane's wings correspond to the round top of your hat or cap. And when a powerful current of air is blown horizontally against a curved surface it tends to make that surface rise up into the air. (This is really the secret of all flight, the strong current of air being in ordinary flying provided by the tremendous forward speed given by the engine.)

So when a storm blows, an anchored seaplane rises straight up in the air like a lift, and tries to hoist her anchor up with her. With a seaplane it is the weight of the anchor that counts, not the strength. Things weigh lighter in water than they do in air. Many a seaplane in a storm has managed to lift her anchor to the surface of the sea without being able to hoist it any higher, and has drifted away down wind like a feather, with her heavy iron anchor "floating" on the surface of the sea.

Mainly About People.

King George is giving a great deal of attention to the hunt now going on throughout his kingdom for tall men who are all the better the more inches they are above six feet. There are only 18 left of the 200 who constituted his grenadier guards before the war, and there is a steady hunt for men to bring up the strength of his body guard.

Captain A. G. Thomson, of the Scandinavian-American line, has in his life travelled 2,000,000 miles of ocean and has made 233 round trips between New York and Copenhagen. He is now in his 71st year and has though decided to take a vacation, although loath to do so.

Dr. Donald J. Cowling, who is directing the $100,000,000 New World Movement campaign of the Northern Baptist Church, has been made an officer of public instruction by the French Government. The honor is the highest France bestows on an educator. It is a reward for Dr. Cowling's success in securing scholarships for 150 French girls in American colleges.

The Prince of Wales is president of the oldest hospital in the British Empire, St. Bartholomew, at Smith Field. This hospital was founded by Peter, the Jester of Henry VIII., in 1133. He delighted the patients, especially the old and bedridden ones, by personally visiting each one of them.
